(2) ἡγούμενος, hēgoúmenos, "one leading the way." A quite general term, Sir 10 2 (ruler of a city); 17 17 (of gentile nations); 46 18 (of the Tyrians). Also 2 17 AV (RV "he that ruleth"), and 32 1 RV ("ruler of a feast," AV "master").

(3) οἱ μεγιστάνες, hoi megistánes, a rare word found only in the pl., for "rulers of the congregation" (Sir 33 18). The same word in Mk 6 21 is tr^{d} "lords."

(4) 2 Macc 4 27 AV for ἔπαρχος, epárchos (RV "governor").

(5) AV inserts the word without Gr equivalent in 1 Macc 6 14; 11 57; 2 Macc 13 2.

3. In the NT

(1) ἄρχων, árchōn, "a person in authority," "a magistrate," "a judge," "a prince"; a councillor, a member of the supreme council of the Jews; a man of influence. "There came a ruler" (Mt 9 18), meaning a ruler of the synagogue (cf Mk 5 22; Lk 8 41); see (2) below; "one of the rulers of the Pharisees" (Lk 14 1), perhaps a member of the Jewish council belonging, at the same time, to the Pharisees, or, more probably, one of the leading Pharisees; "the chief priests and the rulers" (Lk 23 13.35; 24 20; cf Jn 3 1; 7 26.48; 12 42; Acts 3 17; 4 5.8; 13 27; 14 5); the rulers were, with the chief priests and the scribes, members of the Sanhedrin, either of two councils of the Jews (the Great and the Lesser); they were lay-members (elders); "before the rulers" (Acts 16 19), the police magistrates (praetores, "praetors") of the city of Philippi; "Thou shalt not speak evil of a ruler of thy people" (Acts 23 5; cf Ex 22 28, nāsī'; see 1, [3] above), a magistrate, a person in authority (cf Acts 7 27.35; Rom 13 3, the public authorities); "the rulers of this world" (1 Cor 2 6.8), persons being mentally superior to their fellow-men, and so having great influence in shaping their opinions and directing their actions.

(2) ἀρχισυνάγωγος, archisunágōgos, "ruler of the synagogue." He was the presiding officer of a board of elders, who had charge of the synagogue. Sometimes they, also, were given the same name (cf "one of the rulers of the synagogue," Mk 5 22.35; Lk 8 41.49; in Mt 9 18 Jairus is simply called archōn); the ruler mentioned in Lk 13 14 was, of course, the president of the board (cf Acts 18 17, Sosthenes), while in Acts 13 15 the phrase "rulers of the synagogue" simply signifies the board. It was a deliberative body, but at the same time responsible for the maintenance of good order in the synagogue and the orthodoxy of its members; having, therefore, disciplinary power, they were authorized to reprimand, and even to excommunicate, the guilty ones (cf Jn 9 22; 12 42; 16 2).

(3) ἀρχιτρίκλινος, architríklinos, the ruler ("steward," RVm) of the feast (Jn 2 8.9). See separate article.

(4) κοσμοκράτωρ, kosmokrátōr, a "world-ruler" (Eph 6 12). The angels of the devil (Mt 25 41; 12 45) or Satan, the prince of this world (Jn 12 31), participate in his power; they are his tools, their sphere of action being "this darkness," i.e. the morally corrupt state of our present existence.

(5) πολιτάρχης, politárchēs; the prefect of a city (Acts 17 6.8). Luke being the only one of the Bib. authors to hand down to us this word, it is a noteworthy fact that, in relatively modern times, a Gr inscription was discovered containing this very word and, moreover, having reference to the city of Thessalonica (AJT, 1898, II, 598–643). Here it was where Paul and Silas preached the gospel so successfully that the Jews, "being moved with jealousy," caused Jason and certain brethren to be dragged before the rulers of the city (epí toús politárchas). These magistrates suffered themselves to be made the tools of the unscrupulous Jews by demanding and getting security from Jason and the rest.

RULER OF THE FEAST (ἀρχιτρίκλινος, architríklinos; AV governor): The word occurs in the NT in the account of the wedding feast in Cana of Galilee (Jn 2 8.9). According to Ecclus (32 1) it was customary to appoint a "master of the ceremonies" from among the invited guests. It was his duty to determine the places of the guests, to see that the ordinary rules of etiquette were observed, etc, and generally to supervise the arrangements. RVm "steward" is possible if the "governor of the feast" meant the "head waiter" (Merx renders "head servant of the feast"), and not one of the guests appointed for the purpose. But the context is in favor of the view that the person in question was one of the prominent guests—an intimate friend or relative of the host. See RULER, 2, (2). T. LEWIS

RUMAH, rōō′ma (רוּמָה, rūmāh; B, Ῥουμά, Rhoumá, A, Ῥυμά, Rhumá): To this place belonged Pedaiah whose daughter Zebudah (RV "Zebidah") entered the harem of Josiah, king of Judah, and became the mother of Jehoiakim (2 K 23 36). Jos (Ant, X, v, 2) calls the place Abouma, but this is an obvious clerical error for Arouma. This suggests a possible identification with Arumah (Jgs 9 41), which lay not far from Shechem. Another possible identification is with the Rumah mentioned by Jos (BJ, III, vii, 21) in Galilee (cf Neubauer, Géog. du Talm, 203), which may be identical with the modern Khirbet Rūmeh, about 3 miles N. of Ṣeffūriyeh. Some, however, would identify Rumah with Dumah of Josh 15 52, where the substitution of r for d is supported by the LXX (Rheuma), possibly represented by the modern Dōmeh, about 13 miles S.E. of Beit Jibrīn. This of course was in the territory of Judah, and no question of jus connubium is involved, such as might arise in the case of a Galilean site. W. EWING

RUMP, rump: AV uses this word as tr of אַלְיָה, 'alyāh (Ex 29 22; Lev 3 9; 7 3; 8 25; 9 19), where RV correctly renders "fat tail." Reference is here had to the broad tail of the Syrian sheep, which occasionally weighs as much as 20 lbs., and is considered one of the daintiest portions of mutton. It was one of those portions of the peace and trespass offering which were not eaten by the priest or the sacrificer, but which with other choice portions were waved before the Lord and wholly burnt on the altar as a sweet savor unto Jeh.

RUNAGATE, run′a-gāt: A runaway: "The runagates continue in scarceness" (Ps 68 6, Prayer Book Version, RV "The rebellious dwell in a parched land").

RUNNER, run′ẽr. See GAMES.

RUSH: (1) (גֹּמֶא, gōme'; πάπυρος, pápuros, "bulrushes," m "papyrus" [Ex 2 3]; "rush," m "papyrus" [Job 8 11]; "papyrus," AV "rush" [Isa 18 2]; "rushes" [35 7]): This is almost certainly the famous papyrus, Cyperus papyrus (N.O. Cyperaceae), known in Arab. as babīr (whence comes our word "paper"). This plant, the finest of the sedges, flourishes plentifully in Upper Egypt; in Pal there is a great mass of it growing in the marsh to the N. of Lake Huleh, and it also occurs on the Lake of Galilee and the Jordan. Light boats of plaited papyrus have been used on the Nile from ancient times and are mentioned by many writers (cf Ex 2 3; Isa 18 2).

(2) (אַגְמוֹן, 'aghmōn, "rope," m "Heb 'a rope of rushes,'" AV "hook" [Job 41 2]; "[burning] rushes," AV "caldron" [Job 41 20]; "rush," AV "bulrush" [Isa 58 5]; "rush" in Isa 9 14; 19 15, used of the humble and lowly folk as contrasted with the "palm branch," the highest class): The word 'aghmōn comes from אֲגַם, 'ăgham, meaning a marsh (see POOLS), being transferred from the place of the things growing there. The word doubtless includes not only the rushes—of which there are several kinds in Pal—but also members of the sedge family, the Cyperaceae. See also REED.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN

RUST, rust (חֶלְאָה, ḥel'āh; βρῶσις, brōsis): Strictly speaking rust is the red oxide of iron formed by the corrosion of that metal, but by extension it has come to mean corrosion produced on any metal. Ḥel'āh is trd "rust" in Ezk 24 11.12. This rendering is probably based on ver 11. Copper caldrons are still used in Bible lands. Such vessels must be constantly watched when on the fire to guard against the possibility of their becoming dry. If this should happen the contents, whatever they may be, and the vessel itself will be injured. The copper of the caldron oxidizes and scales off in black or brownish scales, or rust. ἰός, iós, was used in Gr to denote the corroding of metals. In Jas 5 3 occurs, "Your gold and your silver are rusted; and their rust . . . . shall eat your flesh as fire." The writers must have had in mind the actions of chemicals upon these metals which formed some such compound as the caustic silver nitrate.

Brōsis, lit. "eating," which occurs in Mt 6 19. 20, may refer to the diseases which attack such vegetation as wheat, grapes, cucumbers, etc. In no country is the saying "where moth and rust consume" (Mt 6 19) more true than in Syria. Any metal subject to corrosion seems to rust faster in that country than anywhere else. There are also many rusting fungi which the people have not learned to destroy and which do much damage to the crops. See also SCUM. JAMES A. PATCH

RUTH, rōōth (רוּת, rūth; Ῥούθ, Rhoúth): The name Ruth is found in the OT only in the book which is so entitled. It is a contraction for re'ūth (רְעוּת), perhaps signifying "comrade," "companion" (fem.; cf Ex 11 2, "every woman of her neighbor"). OHL, 946, explains the word as an abstract noun = "friendship." The Book of Ruth details the history of the one decisive episode owing to which Ruth became an ancestress of David and of the royal house of Judah. From this point of view its peculiar interest lies in the close friendship or alliance between Israel and Moab, which rendered such a connection possible. Not improbably also there is an allusion to this in the name itself.

1. History

The history lies in the period of the Judges (1 1), at the close of a great famine in the land of Israel. Elimelech, a native of Bethlehem, had, with his wife Naomi and two sons, taken refuge in Moab from the famine. There, after an interval of time which is not more precisely defined, he died (1 3), and his two sons, having married women of Moab, in the course of a further ten years also died, and left Orpah and Ruth widows (1 5). Naomi then decided to return to Pal, and her two daughters-in-law accompanied her on her way (1 7). Orpah, however, turned back and only Ruth remained with Naomi, journeying with her to Bethlehem, where they arrived "in the beginning of barley harvest" (1 22). The piety and fidelity of Ruth are thus early exhibited in the course of the narrative, in that she refused to abandon her mother-in-law, although thrice exhorted to do so by Naomi herself, on account of her own great age and the better prospects for Ruth in her own country. Orpah yielded to persuasion, and returned to Moab, but Ruth remained with Naomi.

At Bethlehem Ruth employed herself in gleaning in the field during the harvest and was noticed by Boaz, the owner of the field, a near kinsman of her father-in-law Elimelech. Boaz gave her permission to glean as long as the harvest continued; and told her that he had heard of her filial conduct toward her mother-in-law. Moreover, he directed the reapers to make intentional provision for her by dropping in her way grain from their bundles (2 15 f). She was thus able to return to Naomi in the evening with a whole ephah of barley (ver 17). In answer to questioning she explained that her success in gleaning was due to the good-will of Boaz, and the orders that he had given. She remained accordingly and gleaned with his maidens throughout the barley and wheat harvest, making her home with her mother-in-law (2 23). Naomi was anxious for the remarriage of Ruth, both for her sake and to secure compliance with the usage and law of Israel; and sent her to Boaz to recall to him his duty as near kinsman of her late husband Elimelech (3 1 f). Boaz acknowledged the claim and promised to take Ruth in marriage, failing fulfilment of the legal duty of another whose relationship was nearer than that of Boaz himself (3 8–13). Naomi was confident that Boaz would fulfil his promise, and advised Ruth to wait in patience.

Boaz then adopted the customary and legal measures to obtain a decision. He summoned the near kinsman before ten elders at the gate of the city, related to him the circumstances of Naomi's return, with her desire that Ruth should be married and settled with her father-in-law's land as her marriage-portion, and called upon him to declare his intentions. The near kinsman, whose name and degree of relationship are not stated, declared his inability to undertake the charge, which he renounced in legal form in favor of Boaz according to ancient custom in Israel (4 6 ff). Boaz accepted the charge thus transferred to him, the elders and bystanders bearing witness and pronouncing a formal blessing upon the union of Boaz and Ruth (4 9–12). Upon the birth of a son in due course the women of the city congratulated Naomi, in that the continuance of her family and house was now assured, and the latter became the child's nurse. The name of Obed was given to the boy; and Obed through his son Jesse became the grandfather of David (cf Mt 1 5.6; Lk 3 31.32).

2. Interest and Importance of the Narrative

Thus the life and history of Ruth are important in the eyes of the narrator because she forms a link in the ancestry of the greatest king of Israel. From a more modern point of view the narrative is a simple idyllic history, showing how the faithful loving service of Ruth to her mother-in-law met with its due reward in the restored happiness of a peaceful and prosperous home-life for herself. Incidentally are illustrated also ancient marriage customs of Israel, which in the time of the writer had long since become obsolete. The narrative is brief and told without affectation of style, and on that account will never lose its interest. It has preserved moreover the memory of an incident, the national significance of which may have passed away, but to which value will always be attached for its simplicity and natural grace.

1. Order in the Canon

RUTH, BOOK OF: The place which the Book of Ruth occupies in the order of the books of the Eng. Bible is not that of the Heb Canon. There it is one of the five m^{e}ghillōth or Rolls, which were ordered to be read in the synagogue on 5 special occasions or festivals during the year.

In printed edd of the OT the m^{e}ghillōth are usually arranged in the order: Cant, Ruth, Lam, Eccl, Est. Ruth occupied the second position because the book was appointed to be read at the Feast of Weeks which was the second of the 5 special days. In Heb MSS, however, the order varies considerably. In Spanish MSS generally, and in one at least of the Ger. school cited by Dr. Ginsburg (Intro to the Heb Bible, London, 1897, 4), Ruth precedes Cant; and in the former Eccl is placed before Lam. The m^{e}ghillōth constitute the second portion of the k^{e}thūbhīm or Hagiographa, the third great division of the books of the Heb Scriptures. The Talm, however, dissociates Ruth altogether from the remaining m^{e}ghillōth, and places it first among the Hagiographa, before the Book of Pss. By the Gr translators the book was removed from the position which it held in the Heb Canon, and because it described events contemporaneous with the Judges, was attached as a kind of appendix to the latter work. This sequence was adopted in the Vulg, and so has passed into all modern Bibles.

2. Authorship and Purpose

The book is written without name of author, and there is no direct indication of its date. Its aim is to record an event of interest and importance in the family history of David, and incidentally to illustrate ancient custom and marriage law. There is no ground for supposing, as has been suggested, that the writer had a polemical purpose in view, and desired to show that the strict and stern action taken by Ezra and Nehemiah after the return in forbidding mixed marriages was not justified by precedent. The narrative is simple and direct, and the preservation of the tradition which it records of the descent of Israel's royal house from a Moabite ancestress was probably due in the first instance to oral communication for some considerable time before it was committed to writing. The Book of 1 S also indicates a close relation between David and Moab, when during the period of his outlawry the future king confided his father and mother to the care of the king of Moab (1 S 22 3 f), and so far supports the truth of the tradition which is embodied in the Book of Ruth.

3. Date of Composition

With regard to the date at which the narrative was committed to writing, it is evident from the position of the Book of Ruth in the Heb Canon that the date of its composition is subsequent to the close of the great period of the "earlier prophets." Otherwise it would have found a natural place, as was assigned to it in the Gr Bible, together with the Book of Jgs and other historical writings, in the second division of the Heb Scriptures. In the opening words of the book also, "It came to pass in the days when the judges judged" (Ruth 1 1), the writer appears to look back to the period of the Judges as to a comparatively distant epoch. The character of the diction is pure and chaste; but has been supposed in certain details, as in the presence of so-called Aramaisms, to betray a late origin. The reference to the observance of marriage customs and their sanctions "in former time in Israel" (4 7) does not necessarily imply that the composition of Ruth was later than that of Dt, in which the laws and rights of the succession are enjoined, or that the writer of the former work was acquainted with the latter in its existing form. Slight differences of detail in the procedure would seem to suggest the contrary. On the other hand, the motive of the book in the exhibition of the ancestry of David's house would have lost its significance and raison d'être with the death or disappearance of the last ruler of David's line in the early period of the return from Babylon (cf Zec 4 9). The most probable date therefore for the composition of the book would be in the later days of the exile, or immediately after the return. There is no clue to the authorship. The last four verses, giving the genealogy from Perez to David (cf 1 Ch 2 4–15; Mt 1 3–6; Lk 3 31–33), are generally recognized as a later addition.

4. Ethical Teaching

The ethical value of the Book of Ruth is considerable, as setting forth an example of stedfast filial piety. The action of Ruth in refusing to desert her mother-in-law and persevering in accompanying her to her own land meets with its due reward in the prosperity and happiness which become hers, and in the honor which she receives as ancestress of the royal house of David. The writer desires to show in the person and example of Ruth that a sincere and generous regard for the claims of duty and affection leads to prosperity and honor; and at the same time that the principles and recompense of righteous dealing are not dependent upon race, but are as valid for a Moabitess as for a Jew. There is no distinctive doctrine taught in the book. It is primarily historical, recording a decisive incident in the origin of David's house; and in the second place ethical, indicating and enforcing in a well-known example the advantage and importance of right dealing and the observance of the dictates of filial duty. For detailed contents see preceding article.

Literature.—Eng. comms. upon the Book of Ruth are naturally not numerous. Cf G. W. Thatcher, "Judges and Ruth," in [New] Century Bible; R. A. Watson, in Expositor's Bible; the most recent critical comm. is by L. B. Wolfenson in AJSL, XXVII (July, 1911), 285 ff, who defends the early date of the book. SABAEANS, sa-bē'anz (שְׁבָאִים, shᵉbhā'īm [Joel 3 8 AV], סְבָאִים, ṣᵉbhā'īm; Σαβαείμ, Sabaeím, Σεβαείμ, Sebaeím [Isa 45 14]; סְבָאִים, read ṣābhā'īm, but rendered as though from ṣābhā', "to imbibe," hence "drunkards"; οἰνωμένοι, oinōménoi, "wine-drunken" [Ezk 23 42 AV]): "Sabaeans" is also the tr of the name of the country itself (שְׁבָא, shᵉbhā') in Job 1 15; 6 19. This last, which is the root of shᵉbhā'īm, is regarded by Arabists as coming from that root with the meaning of "to take captive," though seba'a, "he raided" (cf Job 1 15), has also been suggested.

2. Two Different Races

As Sheba is said in Gen 10 7; 10 28; and 25 3 respectively to have been (1) a son of Raamah, the 4th son of Cush; (2) the 10th son of Joktan, son of Eber; (3) the 1st son of Jokshan, 2d son of Abraham and Keturah, at least two nationalities of this name are implied. The former were identified by Jos (Ant, II, x, 2) with the tall people of Saba in Upper Egypt, described by him as a city of Ethiopia, which Moses, when in the service of the Egyptians, besieged and captured.

3. Semitic Sabaeans and Their Commerce

It is the Sem Sabaeans, however, who are the best known, and the two genealogies attributed to them (Joktan-Eber and Jokshan-Abraham) seem to imply two settlements in the land regarded as that of their origin. As Ezekiel (27 23) mentions Haran (Hirran), Canneh (Kannah), and Eden (Aden) as being connected with Sheba, and these three places are known to have been in Southern Arabia, their Sem parentage is undoubted. The Sabaeans are described as being exporters of gold (Isa 60 6; Ps 72 15), precious stones (Ezk 27 23), perfumes (Jer 6 20; Isa and Ezk), and if the rendering "Sabaeans" for Joel 3 (4) 8 be correct, the Sebaim, "a nation far off," dealt in slaves. Literature

The Sabbath was the day on which man was to leave off his secular labors and keep a day holy to Jeh.

1. The Biblical Account

I. Origin of the Sabbath.—The sketch of creation in Gen 1 1—2 3 closes with an impressive account of the hallowing of the 7th day, because on it God rested from all the work which He had made creatively. The word "Sabbath" does not occur in the story; but it is recognized by critics of every school that the author (P) means to describe the Sabbath as primeval. In Ex 20 8–11 (ascribed to JE) the reason assigned for keeping the 7th day as a holy Sabbath is the fact that Jeh rested after the six days of creative activity. Ex 31 17 employs a bold figure, and describes Jeh as refreshing Himself ("catching His breath") after six days of work. The statement that God set apart the 7th day for holy purposes in honor of His own rest after six days of creative activity is boldly challenged by many modern scholars as merely the pious figment of a priestly imagination of the exile. There are so few hints of a weekly Sabbath before Moses, who is comparatively a modern character, that argumentation is almost excluded, and each student will approach the question with the bias of his whole intellectual and spiritual history. There is no distinct mention of the Sabbath in Gen, though a 7-day period is referred to several times (Gen 7 4.10; 8 10.12; 29 27 f). The first express mention of the Sabbath is found in Ex 16 21–30, in connection with the giving of the manna. Jeh taught the people in the wilderness to observe the 7th day as a Sabbath of rest by sending no manna on that day, a double supply being given on the 6th day of the week. Here we have to do with a weekly Sabbath as a day of rest from ordinary secular labor. A little later the Ten Words were spoken by Jeh from Sinai in the hearing of all the people, and were afterward written on the two tables of stone (Ex 20 1–17; 34 1–5.27 f). The Fourth Commandment enjoins upon Israel the observance of the 7th day of the week as a holy day on which no work shall be done by man or beast. Children and servants are to desist from all work, and even the stranger within the gates is required to keep the day holy. The reason assigned is that Jeh rested on the 7th day and blessed it and hallowed it. There is no hint that the restrictions were meant to guard against the wrath of a jealous and angry deity. The Sabbath was meant to be a blessing to man and not a burden. After the sin in connection with the golden calf Jeh rehearses the chief duties required of Israel, and again announces the law of the Sabbath (Ex 34 21, ascribed to J). In the Levitical legislation there is frequent mention of the Sabbath (Ex 31 13–16; 35 2 f; Lev 19 3.30; 23 3.38). A wilful Sabbath-breaker was put to death (Nu 15 32–36). In the Deuteronomic legislation there is equal recognition of the importance and value of the Sabbath (Dt 5 12–15). Here the reason assigned for the observance of the Sabbath is philanthropic and humanitarian: "that thy man-servant and thy maid-servant may rest as well as thou." It is thus manifest that all the Pentateuchal codes, whether proceeding from Moses alone or from many hands in widely different centuries, equally recognize the Sabbath as one of the characteristic institutions of Israel's religious and social life. If we cannot point to any observance of the weekly Sabbath prior to Moses, we can at least be sure that this was one of the institutions which he gave to Israel. From the days of Moses until now the holy Sabbath has been kept by devout Israelites.

2. Critical Theories

"The older theories of the origin of the Jewish Sabbath (connecting it with Egypt, with the day of Saturn, or in general with the seven planets) have now been almost entirely abandoned [see Astronomy, I, 5]. The disposition at present is to regard the day as originally a lunar festival, similar to a Bab custom (Schrader, Stud. u. Krit., 1874), the rather as the cuneiform documents appear to contain a term šabattu or šabattum, identical in form and meaning with the Heb word šabbāthōn." Thus wrote Professor C. H. Toy in 1899 (JBL, XVIII, 190). In a syllabary (II R, 32, 16*a*, b) šabattum is said to be equivalent to ûm nûḫ libbi, the natural tr of which seemed to be "day of rest of the heart." Schrader, Sayce and others so understood the phrase, and naturally looked upon šabattum as equivalent to the Heb Sabbath. But Jensen and others have shown that the phrase should be rendered "day of the appeasement of the mind" (of an offended deity). The reference is to a day of atonement or pacification rather than a day of rest, a day in which one must be careful not to arouse the anger of the god who was supposed to preside over that particular day. Now the term šabattum has been found only 5 or 6 t in the Bab inscriptions and in none of them is it connected with the 7th day of a week. There was, however, a sort of institution among the superstitious Babylonians that has been compared with the Heb Sabbath. In certain months of the year (Elul, Marcheshvan) the 7th, 14th, 19th, 21st and 28th days were set down as favorable days, or unfavorable days, that is, as days in which the king, the priest and the physician must be careful not to stir up the anger of the deity. On these days the king was not to eat food prepared by fire, not to put on royal dress, not to ride in his chariot, etc. As to the 19th day, it is thought that it was included among the unlucky days because it was the 49th (7 times 7) from the 1st of the preceding month. As there were 30 days in the month, it is evident that we are not dealing with a recurring 7th day in the week, as is the case with the Heb Sabbath. Moreover, no proof has been adduced that the term šabattum was ever applied to these dies nefasti or unlucky days. Hence the assertions of some Assyriologists with regard to the Bab origin of the Sabbath must be taken with several grains of salt. Notice must be taken of an ingenious and able paper by Professor M. Jastrow, which was read before the Eleventh International Congress of Orientalists in Paris in 1897, in which the learned author attempts to show that the Heb Sabbath was originally a day of propitiation like the Bab šabattum (AJT, II, 312–52). He argues that the restrictive measures in the Heb laws for the observance of the Sabbath arose from the original conception of the Sabbath as an unfavorable day, a day in which the anger of Jeh might flash forth against men. Although Jastrow has supported his thesis with many arguments that are cogent, yet the reverent student of the Scriptures will find it difficult to resist the impression that the OT writers without exception thought of the Sabbath not as an unfavorable or unlucky day but rather as a day set apart for the benefit of man. Whatever may have been the attitude of the early Hebrews toward the day which was to become a characteristic institution of Judaism in all ages and in all lands, the organs of revelation throughout the OT enforce the observance of the Sabbath by arguments which lay emphasis upon its beneficent and humanitarian aspects.

We must call attention to Meinhold's ingenious hypothesis as to the origin of the Sabbath. In 1894

Theophilus G. Pinches discovered a tablet in which the term shapattu is applied to the 15th day of the month. Meinhold argues that shabattu in Bab denotes the day of the full moon. Dr. Skinner thus describes Meinhold's theory: "He points to the close association of new-moon and Sabbath in nearly all the preëxilic references (Am 8 5; Hos 2 11; Isa 1 13; 2 K 4 23 f); and concludes that in early Israel, as in Babylonia, the Sabbath was the full-moon festival and nothing else. The institution of the weekly Sabbath he traces to a desire to compensate for the loss of the old lunar festivals, when these were abrogated by the Deuteronomic reformation. This innovation he attributes to Ezekiel; but steps toward it are found in the introduction of a weekly day of rest during harvest only (on the ground of Dt 16 8 f; cf Ex 34 21), and in the establishment of the sabbatical year (Lev 25), which he considers to be older than the weekly Sabbath" (ICC on Gen, p. 39). Dr. Skinner well says that Meinhold's theory involves great improbabilities. It is not certain that the Babylonians applied the term šabattu to the 15th day of the month because it was the day of the full moon; and it is by no means certain that the early prophets in Israel identified Sabbath with the festival of the full moon.

The wealth of learning and ingenuity expended in the search for the origin of the Sabbath has up to the present yielded small returns.

1. In the OT

II. History of the Sabbath after Moses.—The early prophets and historians occasionally make mention of the Sabbath. It is sometimes named in connection with the festival of the new moon (2 K 4 23; Am 8 5; Hos 2 11; Isa 1 13; Ezk 46 3). The prophets found fault with the worship on the Sabbath, because it was not spiritual nor prompted by love and gratitude. The Sabbath is exalted by the great prophets who faced the crisis of the Bab exile as one of the most valuable institutions in Israel's life. Great promises are attached to faithful observance of the holy day, and confession is made of Israel's unfaithfulness in profaning the Sabbath (Jer 17 21–27; Isa 56 2.4; 58 13; Ezk 20 12–24). In the Pers period Nehemiah struggled earnestly to make the people of Jerus observe the law of the Sabbath (Neh 10 31; 13 15–22).

2. In the Inter-Testamental Period

With the development of the synagogue the Sabbath became a day of worship and of study of the Law, as well as a day of cessation from all secular employment. That the pious in Israel carefully observed the Sabbath is clear from the conduct of the Maccabees and their followers, who at first declined to resist the onslaught made by their enemies on the Sabbath (1 Macc 2 29–38); but necessity drove the faithful to defend themselves against hostile attack on the Sabbath (1 Macc 2 39–41). It was during the period between Ezra and the Christian era that the spirit of Jewish legalism flourished. Innumerable restrictions and rules were formulated for the conduct of life under the Law. Great principles were lost to sight in the mass of petty details. Two entire treatises of the Mish, Shabbāth and ʿĒrūbhīn, are devoted to the details of Sabbath observance. The subject is touched upon in other parts of the Mish; and in the Gemara there are extended discussions, with citations of the often divergent opinions of the rabbis. In the Mish (Shabbāth, vii.2) there are 39 classes of prohibited actions with regard to the Sabbath, and there is much hair-splitting in working out the details. The beginnings of this elaborate definition of actions permitted and actions forbidden are to be found in the centuries immediately preceding the Christian era. The movement was at flood tide during Our Lord's earthly ministry and continued for centuries afterward, in spite of His frequent and vigorous protests.

3. Jesus and the Sabbath

Apart from His claim to be the Messiah, there is no subject on which Our Lord came into such sharp conflict with the religious leaders of the Jews as in the matter of Sabbath observance. He set Himself squarely against the current rabbinic restrictions as contrary to the spirit of the original law of the Sabbath. The rabbis seemed to think that the Sabbath was an end in itself, an institution to which the pious Israelite must subject all his personal interests; in other words, that man was made for the Sabbath: man might suffer hardship, but the institution must be preserved inviolate. Jesus, on the contrary, taught that the Sabbath was made for man's benefit. If there should arise a conflict between man's needs and the letter of the Law, man's higher interests and needs must take precedence over the law of the Sabbath (Mt 12 1–14; Mk 2 23—3 6; Lk 6 1–11; also Jn 5 1–18; Lk 13 10–17; 14 1–6). There is no reason to think that Jesus meant to discredit the Sabbath as an institution. It was His custom to attend worship in the synagogue on the Sabbath (Lk 4 16). The humane element in the rest day at the end of every week must have appealed to His sympathetic nature. It was the one precept of the Decalogue that was predominantly ceremonial, though it had distinct sociological and moral value. As an institution for the benefit of toiling men and animals, Jesus held the Sabbath in high regard. As the Messiah, He was not subject to its restrictions; He could at any moment assert His lordship over the Sabbath (Mk 2 28). The institution was not on a par with the great moral precepts, which are unchangeable. It is worthy of note that, while Jesus pushed the moral precepts of the Decalogue into the inner realm of thought and desire, thus making the requirement more difficult and the law more exacting, He fought for a more liberal and lenient interpretation of the law of the Sabbath. Rigorous sabbatarians must look elsewhere for a champion of their views.

4. Paul and the Sabbath

The early Christians kept the 7th day as a Sabbath, much after the fashion of other Jews. Gradually the 1st day of the week came to be recognized as the day on which the followers of Jesus would meet for worship. The resurrection of Our Lord on that day made it for Christians the most joyous day of all the week. When Gentiles were admitted into the church, the question at once arose whether they should be required to keep the Law of Moses. It is the glory of Paul that he fought for and won freedom for his gentile fellow-Christians. It is significant of the attitude of the apostles that the decrees of the Council at Jerus made no mention of Sabbath observance in the requirements laid upon gentile Christians (Acts 15 28 f). Paul boldly contended that believers in Jesus, whether Jew or Gentile, were set free from the burdens of the Mosaic Law. Even circumcision counted for nothing, now that men were saved by believing in Jesus (Gal 5 6). Christian liberty as proclaimed by Paul included all days and seasons. A man could observe special days or not, just as his own judgment and conscience might dictate (Rom 14 5 f); but in all such matters one ought to be careful not to put a stumbling-block in a brother's way (Rom 14 13 ff). That Paul contended for personal freedom in respect of the Sabbath is made quite clear in Col 2 16 f, where he groups together dietary laws, feast days, new moons and sabbaths. The early Christians brought over into their mode of observing the Lord's Day the best elements of the Jewish Sabbath, without its onerous restrictions. JOHN RICHARD SAMPEY

SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST POSITION

The views entertained by Seventh-Day Adventists concerning the nature and obligation of the Sabbath may conveniently be presented under three general divisions: (1) what the Bible says concerning the Sabbath; (2) what history says concerning the Sabbath; (3) the significance of the Sabbath.

1. What the Bible Says concerning the Sabbath

(1) OT teaching.—In their views concerning the institution and primal obligation of the Sabbath, Seventh-Day Adventists are in harmony with the views held by the early representatives of nearly all the evangelical denominations. The Sabbath is coeval with the finishing of creation, and the main facts connected with establishing it are recorded in Gen 2 2.3. The blessing here placed upon the seventh day distinguishes it from the other days of the week, and the day thus blessed was "sanctified" (AV, RV "hallowed") and set apart for man.

That the Sabbath thus instituted was well known throughout the Patriarchal age is clearly established both by direct evidence and by necessary inference.

"If we had no other passage than this of Gen 2 3, there would be no difficulty in deducing from it a precept for the universal observance of a Sabbath, or seventh day, to be devoted to God as holy time by all of that race for whom the earth and all things therein were specially prepared. The first men must have known it. The words, 'He hallowed it,' can have no meaning otherwise. They would be a blank unless in reference to some who were required to keep it holy" (Lange's Comm. on Gen 2 3, I, 197).

"And the day arrived when Moses went to Goshen to see his brethren, that he saw the children of Israel in their burdens and hard labor, and Moses was grieved on their account. And Moses returned to Egypt and came to the house of Pharaoh, and came before the king, and Moses bowed down before the king. And Moses said unto Pharaoh, I pray thee, my lord, I have come to seek a small request from thee, turn not away my face empty; and Pharaoh said unto him, Speak. And Moses said unto Pharaoh, Let there be given unto thy servants the children of Israel who are in Goshen, one day to rest therein from their labor. And the king answered Moses and said, Behold I have lifted up thy face in this thing to grant thy request. And Pharaoh ordered a proclamation to be issued throughout Egypt and Goshen, saying, To you, all the children of Israel, thus says the king, for six days you shall do your work and labor, but on the seventh day you shall rest, and shall not perform any work; thus shall you do in all the days, as the king and Moses the son of Bathia have commanded. And Moses rejoiced at this thing which the king had granted to him, and all the children of Israel did as Moses ordered them. For this thing was from the Lord to the children of Israel, for the Lord had begun to remember the children of Israel to save them for the sake of their fathers. And the Lord was with Moses, and his fame went throughout Egypt. And Moses became great in the eyes of all the Egyptians, and in the eyes of all the children of Israel, seeking good for his people Israel, and speaking words of peace regarding them to the king" (Book of Jashar 70:41–51, published by Noah & Gould, New York, 1840).

"Hence you can see that the Sabbath was before the Law of Moses came, and has existed from the beginning of the world. Esp. have the devout, who have preserved the true faith, met together and called upon God on this day" (Luther's Works, XXXV, p. 330).

"Why should God begin two thousand years after (the creation of the world) to give men a Sabbath upon the reason of His rest from the creation of it, if He had never called man to that commemoration before? And it is certain that the Sabbath was observed at the falling of the manna before the giving of the Law; and let any considering Christian judge . . . . (1) whether the not falling of manna, or the rest of God after the creation, was like to be the original reason of the Sabbath; (2) and whether, if it had been the first, it would not have been said, Remember to keep holy the Sabbath day; for on six days the manna fell, and not on the seventh; rather than 'for in six days God created heaven and earth, etc, and rested the seventh day.' And it is casually added, 'Wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath day, and hallowed it.' Nay, consider whether this annexed reason intimates not that the day on this ground being hallowed before, therefore it was that God sent not down the manna on that day, and that He prohibited the people from seeking it" (Richard Baxter, Practical Works, III, 774, ed 1707).

That the Sabbath was known to those who came out of Egypt, even before the giving of the Law at Sinai, is shown from the experience with the manna, as recorded in Ex 16 22–30. The double portion on the sixth day, and its preservation, was the constantly recurring miracle which reminded the people of their obligation to observe the Sabbath, and that the Sabbath was a definite day, the seventh day. To the people, first wondering at this remarkable occurrence, Moses said, "This is that which the Lord hath said, To morrow is the rest of the holy sabbath unto the Lord" (ver 23 AV). And to some who went out to gather manna on the seventh day, the Lord administered this rebuke: "How long refuse ye to keep my commandments and my laws?" (ver 28). All this shows that the Sabbath law was well understood, and that the failure to observe it rendered the people justly subject to Divine reproof.

At Sinai, the Sabbath which was instituted at creation, and had been observed during the intervening centuries, was embodied in that formal statement of man's duties usually designated as the "Ten Commandments." It is treated as an institution already well known and the command is, "Remember the sabbath day, to keep it holy" (Ex 20 8). In the 4th commandment the basis of the Sabbath is revealed. It is a memorial of the Creator's rest at the close of those six days in which He made "heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is." For this reason "Jeh blessed the sabbath day, and hallowed it." This blessing was not placed upon the day at Sinai, but in the beginning, when "God blessed the seventh day, and hallowed it" (Gen 2 3).

From the very nature of the basis of the Sabbath, as set forth in this commandment, both the institution itself and the definite day of the Sabbath are of a permanent nature. So long as it is true that God created heaven and earth, and all things therein, so long will the Sabbath remain as a memorial of that work; and so long as it is true that this creative work was completed in six days, and that God Himself rested on the seventh day, and was refreshed in the enjoyment of His completed work, so long will it be true that the memorial of that work can properly be celebrated only upon the seventh day of the week.

During all the period from the deliverance out of Egypt to the captivity in Babylon, the people of God were distinguished from the nations about them by the worship of the only true God, and the observance of His holy day. The proper observance of the true Sabbath would preserve them from idolatry, being a constant reminder of the one God, the Creator of all things. Even when Jerus was suffering from the attacks of the Babylonians, God assured His people, through the prophet Jeremiah, that if they would hallow the Sabbath day, great should be their prosperity, and the city should remain forever (Jer 17 18). This shows that the spiritual observance of the Sabbath was the supreme test of their right relation to God. In those prophecies of Isaiah, which deal primarily with the restoration from Babylon, remarkable promises were made to those who would observe the Sabbath, as recorded in Isa 56 1–7.

(2) NT teaching.—From the record found in the four Gospels, it is plain that the Jews during all the previous centuries had preserved a knowledge both of the Sabbath institution and of the definite day.

It is equally plain that they had made the Sabbath burdensome by their own rigorous exactions concerning it. And Christ, the Lord of the Sabbath, both by example and by precept, brushed aside these traditions of men that He might reveal the Sabbath of the commandment as God gave it—a blessing and not a burden. A careful reading of the testimony of the evangelists will show that Christ taught the observance of the commandments of God, rather than the traditions of men, and that the charge of Sabbath-breaking was brought against Him for no other reason than that He refused to allow the requirements of man to change the Sabbath, blessed of God, into a merely human institution, grievous in its nature, and enforced upon the people with many and troublesome restrictions.

All are agreed that Christ and His disciples observed the seventh-day Sabbath previous to the crucifixion. That His followers had received no intimation of any proposed change at His death, is evident from the recorded fact that on the day when He was in the tomb they rested, "on the sabbath . . . . according to the commandment" (Lk 23 56); and that they treated the following day, the first day of the week, the same as of old, is further evident, as upon that day they came unto the sepulcher for the purpose of anointing the body of Jesus. In the Book of Acts, which gives a brief history of the work of the disciples in proclaiming the gospel of a risen Saviour, no other Sabbath is recognized than the seventh day, and this is mentioned in the most natural way as the proper designation of a well-known institution (Acts 13 14.27.42; 16 13; 18 4).

In Our Lord's great prophecy, in which He foretold the experience of the church between the first and the second advent, He recognized the seventh-day Sabbath as an existing institution at the time of the destruction of Jerus (70 AD), when He instructed His disciples, "Pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on a sabbath" (Mt 24 20). Such instruction given in these words, and at that time, would have been confusing in the extreme, had there been any such thing contemplated as the overthrow of the Sabbath law at the crucifixion, and the substitution of another day upon an entirely different basis.

That the original Sabbath is to be observed, not only during the present order of things, but also after the restoration when, according to the vision of the revelator, a new heaven and a new earth will take the place of the heaven and the earth that now are, is clearly intimated in the words of the Lord through the prophet Isaiah: "For as the new heavens and the new earth, which I will make, shall remain before me, saith Jeh, so shall your seed and your name remain. And it shall come to pass, that from one new moon to another, and from one sabbath to another, shall all flesh come to worship before me, saith Jeh" (Isa 66 22.23).

Seventh-Day Adventists regard the effort to establish the observance of another day than the seventh by using such texts as Jn 20 19.26; Acts 20 7; 1 Cor 16 1.2; Rev 1 10 as being merely an afterthought, an effort to find warrant for an observance established upon other than Bib. authority. During the last two or three centuries there has been a movement for the restoration of the original seventh-day Sabbath, not as a Jewish, but as a Christian, institution. This work, commenced and carried forward by the Seventh-Day Baptists, has been taken up and pushed with renewed vigor by the Seventh-Day Adventists during the present generation, and the Bible teaching concerning the true Sabbath is now being presented in nearly every country, both civilized and uncivilized, on the face of the earth.

2. What History Says about the Sabbath

(1) Josephus.—This summary of history must necessarily be brief, and it will be impossible, for lack of space, to quote authorities. From the testimony of Jos it is clear that the Jews, as a nation, continued to observe the seventh-day Sabbath until their overthrow, when Jerus was captured by Titus, 70 AD. As colonies, and individuals, scattered over the face of the earth, the Jews have preserved a knowledge of the original Sabbath, and the definite day, until the present time. They constitute a living testimony for the benefit of all who desire to know the truth of this matter.

(2) Church history.—According to church history the seventh-day Sabbath was observed by the early church, and no other day was observed as a Sabbath during the first two or three centuries (see HDB, IV, 322 b).

In the oft-repeated letter of Pliny, the Rom governor of Bithynia, to the emperor Trajan, written about 112 AD, there occurs the expression, "a certain stated day," which is usually assumed to mean Sunday. With reference to this matter W. B. Taylor, in Historical Comms., ch i, sec. 47, makes the following statement: "As the Sabbath day appears to have been quite as commonly observed at this date as the sun's day (if not even more so), it is just as probable that this 'stated day' referred to by Pliny was the 7th day as that it was the 1st day; though the latter is generally taken for granted." "Sunday was distinguished as a day of joy by the circumstances that men did not fast upon it, and that they prayed standing up and not kneeling, as Christ had now been raised from the dead. The festival of Sunday, like all other festivals, was always only a human ordinance, and it was far from the intentions of the apostles to establish a Divine command in this respect, far from them, and from the early apostolic church, to transfer the laws of the Sabbath to Sunday. Perhaps at the end of the 2d cent., a false application of this kind had begun to take place; for men appear by that time to have considered laboring on Sunday as a sin" (Tertullian De Orat., c. 23). This quotation is taken from Rose's Neander, London, 1831, I, 33 f, and is the correct tr from Neander's first Ger. ed, Hamburg, 1826, I, pt. 2, p. 339. Neander has in his 2d ed, 1842, omitted the second sentence, in which he expressly stated that Sunday was only a human ordinance, but he has added nothing to the contrary. "The Christians in the ancient church very soon distinguished the first day of the week, Sunday; however, not as a Sabbath, but as an assembly day of the church, to study the Word of God together and to celebrate the ordinances one with another: without a shadow of doubt this took place as early as the first part of the 2d cent." (Geschichte des Sonntags, 60).

Gradually, however, the first day of the week came into prominence as an added day, but finally by civil and ecclesiastical authority as a required observance. The first legislation on this subject was the famous law of Constantine, enacted 321 AD. The acts of various councils during the 4th and 5th cents. established the observance of the first day of the week by ecclesiastical authority, and in the great apostasy which followed, the rival day obtained the ascendancy. During the centuries which followed, however, there were always witnesses for the true Sabbath, although under great persecution. And thus in various lands, the knowledge of the true Sabbath has been preserved.

3. The Significance of the Sabbath

In the creation of the heavens and the earth the foundation of the gospel was laid. At the close of His created work, "God saw everything that he had made, and, behold, it was very good" (Gen 1 31). The Sabbath was both the sign and the memorial of that creative power which is able to make all things good. But man, made in the image of God, lost that image through sin. In the gospel, provision is made for the restoration of the image of God in the soul of man. The Creator is the Redeemer and redemption is the new creation. As the Sabbath was the sign of that creative power which wrought in Christ, the Word, in the making of the heaven and the earth and all things therein, so it is the sign of that same creative power working through the same eternal Word for the restoration of all things. "Wherefore if any man is in Christ, there is a new creation: the old things are passed away; behold, they are become new" (2 Cor 5 17 m). "For neither is circumcision anything, nor uncircumcision, but a new creation" (Gal 6 15 m). "For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus for good works, which God afore prepared that we should walk in them" (Eph 2 10).

A concrete illustration of this gospel meaning of the Sabbath is found in the deliverance of Israel from Egypt. The same creative power which wrought in the beginning was exercised in the signs and miracles which preceded their deliverance, and in those miracles, such as the opening of the Red Sea, the giving of the manna, and the water from the rock, which attended the journeyings of the Israelites. In consequence of these manifestations of creative power in their behalf, the children of Israel were instructed to remember in their observance of the Sabbath that they were bondmen in the land of Egypt. Israel's deliverance from Egypt is the type of every man's deliverance from sin; and the instruction to Israel concerning the Sabbath shows its true significance in the gospel of salvation from sin, and the new creation in the image of God.

Furthermore, the seventh-day Sabbath is the sign of both the divinity and the deity of Christ. God only can create. He through whom this work is wrought must be one with God. To this the Scriptures testify: "In the beginning was the Word, ... and the Word was God. . . . . All things were made through him; and without him was not anything made that hath been made." But this same Word which was with God, and was God, "became flesh, and dwelt among us" (Jn 1 1.3.14). This is the eternal Son, "in whom we have our redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of our trespasses, according to the riches of his grace" (Eph 1 7). To the Christian the Sabbath, which was the sign and memorial of that Divine power which wrought through the eternal Word in the creation of the heaven and the earth, becomes the sign of the same power working through the same eternal Son to accomplish the new creation, and is thus the sign of both the divinity and the deity of Christ.

Inasmuch as the redemptive work finds its chiefest expression in the cross of Christ, the Sabbath, which is the sign of that redemptive work, becomes the sign of the cross.

Seventh-Day Adventists teach and practise the observance of the Sabbath, not because they believe in salvation through man's effort to keep the law of God, but because they believe in that salvation which alone can be accomplished by the creative power of God working through the eternal Son to create believers anew in Christ Jesus.

Seventh-Day Adventists believe, and teach, that the observance of any other day than the seventh as the Sabbath is the sign of that predicted apostasy in which the man of sin would be revealed who would exalt himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped.

Seventh-Day Adventists believe, and teach, that the observance of the true Sabbath in this generation is a part of that gospel work which is to make ready a people prepared for the Lord.

SABBATH DAY'S JOURNEY, jûr′ni (σαββάτου ὁδός, sabbátou hodós): Used only in Acts 1 12, where it designates the distance from Jerus to the Mount of Olives, to which Jesus led His disciples on the day of His ascension. The expression comes from rabbinical usage to indicate the distance a Jew might travel on the Sabbath without transgressing the Law, the command against working on that day being interpreted as including travel (see Ex 16 27–30). The limit set by the rabbis to the Sabbath day's journey was 2,000 cubits from one's house or domicile, which was derived from the statement found in Josh 3 4 that this was the distance between the ark and the people on their march, this being assumed to be the distance between the tents of the people and the tabernacle during the sojourn in the wilderness. Hence it must have been allowable to travel thus far to attend the worship of the tabernacle. We do not know when this assumption in regard to the Sabbath day's journey was made, but it seems to have been in force in the time of Christ. The distance of the Mount of Olives from Jerus is stated in Jos (Ant, XX, viii, 6) to have been five stadia or furlongs and in BJ, V, ii, 3, six stadia, the discrepancy being explained by supposing a different point of departure. This would make the distance of the Sabbath day's journey from 1,000 to 1,200 yds., the first agreeing very closely with the 2,000 cubits. The rabbis, however, invented a way of increasing this distance without technically infringing the Law, by depositing some food at the 2,000-cubit limit, before the Sabbath, and declaring that spot a temporary domicile. They might then proceed 2,000 cubits from this point without transgressing the Law.

And in some cases even this intricacy of preparation was unnecessary. If, for instance, the approach of the Sabbath found one on his journey, the traveler might select some tree or some stone wall at a distance of 2,000 paces and mentally declare this to be his residence for the Sabbath, in which case he was permitted to go the 2,000 paces to the selected tree or wall and also 2,000 paces beyond, but in such a case he must do the work thoroughly and must say: "Let my Sabbath residence be at the trunk of that tree," for if he merely said: "Let my Sabbath residence be under that tree," this would not be sufficient, because the expression would be too general and indefinite (Tract. 'Ērūbhīn 4 7).

Other schemes for extending the distance have been devised, such as regarding the quarter of the town in which one dwells, or the whole town itself, as the domicile, thus allowing one to proceed from any part of the town to a point 2,000 cubits beyond its utmost limits. This was most probably the case with walled towns, at least, and boundary stones have been found in the vicinity of Gaza with inscriptions supposed to mark these limits. The 2,000-cubit limits around the Levitical cities (Nu 35 5) may have suggested the limit of the Sabbath day's journey also. The term came to be used as a designation of distance which must have been more or less definite.

SABBATH, MORROW AFTER THE. See Morrow after the Sabbath.

SABBATH, SECOND AFTER THE FIRST (σάββατον δευτερόπρωτον, sábbaton deuteróprōton [Lk 6 1], lit. "the second-first sabbath," of RVm): We will mention only a few of the explanations elicited by this expression. (1) It was the first Sabbath in the second year of a 7-year cycle comprising the period from one Sabbatic year to the other; (2) the first Sabbath after the second day of Passover, i.e. the first of the seven Sabbaths the Hebrews were to "count unto" themselves from "the morrow after the sabbath" (the day after Easter) until Pentecost (Lev 23 15); (3) the first Sabbath in the Jewish ecclesiastical year (about the middle of March), the first Sabbath in the civil year (about the middle of September) being counted as the "first-first" Sabbath; (4) the term deuteróprōtos, is a monstrous combination of the words deúteros, "second," and prṓtos, "first," attributable to unskilful attempts at textual emendation on the part of copyists. This supposition would, of course, render unnecessary all other efforts to unravel the knotty problem, and, as a matter of fact, deuteroprōtos is omitted by many MSS (including א and B). To those not feeling inclined to accept this solution we would suggest the first of the above-named explanations as the most natural and probable one.

SABBATHEUS, sab-a-thē′us: AV=RV Sabbateus (q.v.).

SABBATHS, sab′aths, OF YEARS (שַׁבְּתֹת שָׁנִים, shabb^{e}thōth shānīm; ἀναπαύσεις ἐτῶν, anapaúseis etôn [Lev 25 8]): The seven sabbatic years preceding the Year of Jubilee. See Sabbatical Year; Jubilee Year; Astronomy, I, 5.

SABBATICAL, sa-bat′ik-al, YEAR (שְׁנַת שַׁבָּתוֹן, sh^{e}nath shabbāthōn; ἐνιαυτὸς ἀναπαύσεως, eniautós anapaúseōs, "a year of solemn rest"; or שַׁבַּת שַׁבָּתוֹן, shabbath shabbāthôn; σάββατα ἀνάπαυσις, sábbata anápausis, "a sabbath of solemn rest" [Lev 25 4];

1. Primary Intention or שְׁנַת הַשְּׁמִטָּה, shᵉnath ha-shᵉmiṭṭāh; ἔτος τῆς ἀφέσεως, étos tḗs aphéseōs, "the year of release" [Dt 15 9; 31 10]): We find the first rudiments of this institution in the so-called Covenant Book (Ex 21–23). Its connection with the day of rest (Sabbath) is obvious, although it strikes us as somewhat remarkable that in Ex 23 10–12 the regulation regarding the 7th year should precede the statute respecting the 7th day. Still it seems natural that after the allusion in ver 9, "Ye were sojourners in the land of Egypt," the Covenant Book should put in a good word for the poor in Israel (ver 11: "Let it rest and lie fallow, that the poor of thy people may eat"). Even the beasts of the field are remembered (cf Jon 4 11).

We must, therefore, conclude that in this early period of the history of Israel the regulation regarding the 7th year was primarily intended for the relief of the poor and for the awakening of a sense of responsibility in the hearts of those better provided with the means of subsistence. It would be wrong, however, to deny its Sabbatic character, for the text says expressly, "But in the 7th year thou shalt let it rest" (lit. "thou shalt release it"), implying that the land was entitled to a rest because it needed it; it must be released for a time in order to gain fresh strength and insure its future fertility. Two motives, then, present themselves most clearly, one of a social, the other of an economic character, and both are rooted in God's dealings with Israel (cf Ex 21 1).

2. Mosaic Legislation Humane

Another evidence of the humane spirit pervading the Mosaic Law may be found in Ex 21 2–6 where, in the case of a Heb slave, the length of his servitude is limited to six years. The connection with the idea of the Sabbath is evident, but we fail to detect here any reference to the Sabbatical year. It is clear that the 7th year in which a slave might be set free need not necessarily coincide with the Sabbatical year, though it might, of course, The same is true of Dt 15 12–18; it has nothing to do with the Sabbatical year. On the other hand it is reasonable to assume that the "release" mentioned in Dt 15 1–3 took place in the Sabbatical year; in other words, its scope had been enlarged in later years so as to include the release from pecuniary obligation, i.e. the remission of debts or, at least, their temporary suspension. This means that the children of Israel were now developing from a purely agricultural people to a commercial nation. Still the same spirit of compassion for the poor and those struggling for a living asserts itself as in the earlier period, and it goes without saying that the old regulation concerning the release of the land in the 7th year was still in force (cf ver 2: "because Jeh's release hath been proclaimed").

According to ver 1, this proclamation occurred at the end of every 7 years, or, rather, during the 7th year; for we must be careful not to strain the expression "at the end" (cf ver 9, where the 7th year is called "the year of release"; it is quite natural to identify this 7th year with the Sabbatical year).

Moreover, we are now almost compelled to assert that the Sabbatical year by this time had become an institution observed simultaneously all over the country. From the wording of the regulation regarding the 7th year in the Covenant Book we are not certain about this in those early times. But now it is different. "Jeh's release hath been proclaimed."

3. General Observance

It was a solemn and general proclamation, the date of which was very likely the day of atonement in the 7th month (the Sabbatical month). The celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles (booths) began five days later and it lasted from the 15th day to the 21st of the 7th month (Tisri). In the Sabbatical year, at that time, the Law was read "before all Israel in their hearing," a fact which tends to prove that the Sabbatical year had become a matter of general and simultaneous observance (cf Dt 31 10–13). Another lesson may be deduced from this passage: it gives us a hint respecting the use to which the people may have put their leisure time during the 12 months of Sabbatical rest; it may have been a period of religious and probably other instruction.

In Lev 25 1–7 the central idea of the Sabbatical year is unfolded. Although it has been said we should be careful not to look for too much of the ideal and dogmatic in the institutions of the children of Israel, yet we must never lose sight of the religious and educational character even of their ancient legislation.

4. Central Idea

One central thought is brought home to them, viz. God is the owner of the soil, and through His grace only the chosen people have come into its possession. Their time, i.e. they themselves, belong to Him: this is the deepest meaning of the day of rest; their land, i.e. their means of subsistence, belong to Him: this reveals to us the innermost significance of the year of rest. It was Jeh's pleasure to call the children of Israel into life, and if they live and work and prosper, they are indebted to His unmerited loving-kindness. They should, therefore, put their absolute trust in Him, never doubt His word or His power, always obey Him and so always receive His unbounded blessings.

If we thus put all the emphasis on the religious character of the Sabbatical year, we are in keeping with the idea permeating the OT, namely that the children of Israel are the chosen people of Jeh. All their agricultural, social, commercial and political relations were to be built upon their Divine calling and shaped according to God's sovereign will.

But did they live up to it? Or, to limit the question to our subject: Did they really observe the Sabbatical year? There are those who hold that the law regarding the Sabbatical year was not observed before the captivity. In order to prove this assertion they point to Lev 26 34 f.43; also to 2 Ch 36 21. But all we can gather from these passages is the palpable conclusion that the law regarding the Sabbatical year had not been strictly obeyed, a deficiency which may mar the effect of any law.

The possibility of observing the precept respecting the Sabbatical year is demonstrated by the post-exilic history of the Jewish people. Nehemiah registers the solemn fact that the reëstablished nation entered into a covenant to keep the law and to maintain the temple worship (Neh 9 38; 10 32 ff). In ver 31 of the last-named chapter he alludes to the 7th year, "that we would forego the 7th year, and the exaction of every debt." We are not sure of the exact meaning of this short allusion; it may refer to the Sabbatical rest of the land and the suspension of debts.

For a certainty we know that the Sabbatical year was observed by the Jews at the time of Alexander the Great. When he was petitioned by the Samaritans "that he would remit the tribute of the 7th year to them, because they did not sow therein, he asked who they were that made such a petition"; he was told they were Hebrews, etc (Jos, Ant, XI, viii, 6).

During Maccabean and Asmonean times the law regarding the Sabbatical year was strictly observed, although it frequently weakened the cause of the Jews (1 Macc 6 49.53; Jos, Ant, XIII, viii, 1; cf BJ, I, ii, 4; Ant, XIV, x, 6; XV, i, 2). Again we may find references to the Sabbatical year in Jos, Ant, XIV, xvi, 2, etc; Tac. Hist. v.4, etc, all of which testifies to the observance of the Sabbatical year in the Herodian era. The words of Tacitus show the proud Roman's estimate of the Jewish character and customs: "For the 7th day they are said to have prescribed rest because this day ended their labors; then, in addition, being allured by their lack of energy, they also spend the 7th year in laziness." SABBEUS, sa-bē′us (Σαββαίας, Sabbaías): In 1 Esd 9 32, the same as "Shemaiah" in Ezr 10 31.

SABI, sā′bī:

(1) A, Σαβεί, Sabeí, B, Τωβείς, Tōbeís, Fritzsche; AV Sami): Eponym of a family of porters who returned with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 28)="Shobai" in Ezr 2 42; Neh 7 45.

(2) AV=RV Sabie (q.v.).

SABIAS, sa-bī′as (Σαβίας, Sabías, Fritzsche, ᾿Ασαβίας, Asabías; AV Assabias): One of the six "captains over thousands" who supplied the Levites with much cattle for Josiah's Passover (1 Esd 1 9) ="Hashabiah" in 2 Ch 35 9.

SABIE, sā′bi-ē (Σαβειή, Sabeiḗ, or Σαβιή, Sabiḗ; AV Sabi): In 1 Esd 5 34 both AV and RV, following A, read "the sons of Phacareth, the sons of Sabie" (AV "Sabi") for the "Pochereth-hazzebaim" of Ezr 2 57; Neh 7 59. B reads correctly as one proper name: "Phacareth Sabie."

SABTA, or SABTAH, sab′ta (סַבְתָּא, ṣabhtā′, סַבְתָּה, ṣabhtāh): Third son of Cush (Gen 10 7=1 Ch 1 9). A place Sabta is probably to be looked for in South Arabia. Arab geographers give no exact equivalent of the name. Al Bekri (i.65) quotes a line of early poetry in which Dhu ′l Sabta is mentioned, and the context might indicate a situation in Yemamah; but the word is possibly not a proper name. It is usually identified with Saubatha (Ptol., vi.7, 38) or with the Sabota of Pliny (vi.32; xii.32), an old mercantile city in South Arabia celebrated for its trade in frankincense and, according to Ptolemy, possessing 60 temples. It is said also to have been the territory of a king Elisarus, whose name presents a striking resemblance to Dhu ′l-Adhār, one of the "Tubbas" or Himyarite kings of Yemen. Another conjecture is the Saphtha of Ptolemy (vi.7, 30) near the Arabian shore of the Pers Gulf.

SABTECA, sab′tē̆-ka (סַבְתְּכָא, ṣabhtᵉkhā′; Σαβακαθά, Sabakathá, Σεβεθαχά, Sebethachá; AV Sabtechah): The 5th named of the sons of Cush in the genealogy of Gen 10 5–7. In 1 Ch 1 8.9 AV reads "Sabtecha," RV "Sabteca." Many conjectures have been made as to the place here indicated. Recently Glazer (Skizze, II, 252) has revived the suggestion of Bochart that it is to be identified with Samydake in Carmania on the E. of the Pers Gulf. This seems to rest on nothing more than superficial resemblance of the names; but the phonetic changes involved are difficult. Others have thought of various places in Arabia, toward the Pers Gulf; but the data necessary for any satisfactory decision are not now available.

SACAR, sā′kär (שָׂכָר, sākhār):

(1) Father of Ahiam, a follower of David (1 Ch 11 35, B, ᾿Αχάρ, Achár, A, Σαχάρ, Sachár="Sharar" of 2 S 23 33; Sharar is favored as the original reading).

(2) Eponym of a family of gatekeepers (1 Ch 26 4).

SACKBUT, sak′but. See Music, III, 1, (f).

SACKCLOTH, sak′klōth. See Burial.

1. The Term

SACRAMENTS, sak′ra-ments: The word "sacrament" comes from the Lat sacramentum, which in the classical period of the language was used in two chief senses: (1) as a legal term to denote the sum of money deposited by two parties to a suit which was forfeited by the loser and appropriated to sacred uses; (2) as a military term to designate the oath of obedience taken by newly enlisted soldiers. Whether referring to an oath of obedience or to something set apart for a sacred purpose, it is evident that sacramentum would readily lend itself to describe such ordinances as Baptism and the Lord's Supper. In the Gr NT, however, there is no word nor even any general idea corresponding to "sacrament," nor does the earliest history of Christianity afford any trace of the application of the term to certain rites of the church. Pliny (c 112 AD) describes the Christians of Bithynia as "binding themselves by a sacramentum to commit no kind of crime" (Epp. x.97), but scholars are now pretty generally agreed that Pliny here uses the word in its old Rom sense of an oath or solemn obligation, so that its occurrence in this passage is nothing more than an interesting coincidence.

It is in the writings of Tertullian (end of 2d and beginning of 3d cent.) that we find the first evidence of the adoption of the word as a technical term to designate Baptism, the Eucharist, and other rites of the Christian church. This Christian adoption of sacramentum may have been partly occasioned by the evident analogies which the word suggests with Baptism and the Eucharist; but what appears to have chiefly determined its history in this direction was the fact that in the Old Lat VSS (as afterward in the Vulg) it had been employed to translate the Gr μυστήριον, mustḗrion, "a mystery" (e.g. Eph 5 32; 1 Tim 3 16; Rev 1 20; 17 7)—an association of ideas which was greatly fostered in the early church by the rapidly growing tendency to an assimilation of Christian worship with the mystery-practices of the Gr-Rom world.

2. Nature and Number

Though esp. employed to denote Baptism and the Eucharist, the name "sacraments" was for long used so loosely and vaguely that it was applied to facts and doctrines of Christianity as well as to its symbolic rites. Augustine's definition of a sacrament as "the visible form of an invisible grace" so far limited its application. But we see how widely even a definition like this might be stretched when we find Hugo of St. Victor (12th cent.) enumerating as many as 30 sacraments that had been recognized in the church. The Council of Trent was more exact when it declared that visible forms are sacraments only when they represent an invisible grace and become its channels, and when it sought further to delimit the sacramental area by reënacting (1547) a decision of the Council of Florence (1439), in which for the first time the authority of the church was given to a suggestion of Peter Lombard (12th cent.) and other schoolmen that the number of the sacraments should be fixed at seven, viz. Baptism, Confirmation, the Eucharist, Penance, Extreme Unction, Orders, and Matrimony—a suggestion which was supported by certain fanciful analogies designed to show that seven was a sacred number.

The divergence of the Protestant churches from this definition and scheme was based on the fact that these proceeded on no settled principles. The notion that there are seven sacraments has no NT authority, and must be described as purely arbitrary; while the definition of a sacrament is still so vague that anything but an arbitrary selection of particulars is impossible. It is perfectly arbitrary, for example, to place Baptism and the Lord's Supper, which were instituted by Christ as ordinances of the church, in the same category with marriage, which rests not on His appointment but on a natural relationship between the sexes that is as old as the human race. While, therefore, the Reformers retained the term "sacrament" as a convenient one to express the general idea that has to be drawn from the characteristics of the rites classed together under this name, they found the distinguishing marks of sacraments (1) in their institution by Christ, (2) in their being enjoined by Him upon His followers, (3) in their being bound up with His word and revelation in such a way that they become "the expressions of Divine thoughts, the visible symbols of Divine acts." And as Baptism and the Lord's Supper are the only two rites for which such marks can be claimed, it follows that there are only two NT sacraments. Their unique place in the original revelation justifies us in separating them from all other rites and ceremonies that may have arisen in the history of the church, since it raises them to the dignity of forming an integral part of the historical gospel. A justification for their being classed together under a common name may be found, again, in the way in which they are associated in the NT (Acts 2 41.42; 1 Cor 10 1–4) and also in the analogy which Paul traces between Baptism and the Lord's Supper on the one hand, and Circumcision and the Passover—the two most distinctive rites of the Old Covenant—on the other (Col 2 11; 1 Cor 5 7; 11 26).

3. Institution by Christ

The assumption made above, that both Baptism and the Lord's Supper owe their origin as sacraments of the church to their definite appointment by Christ Himself, has been strongly challenged by some modern critics.

(1) In regard to Baptism it has been argued that as Mk 16 15 f occurs in a passage (vs 9–20) which textual criticism has shown to have formed no part of the original Gospel, Mt 28 19, standing by itself, is too slender a foundation to support the belief that the ordinance rests upon an injunction of Jesus, more esp. as its statements are inconsistent with the results of historical criticism. These results, it is affirmed, prove that all the narratives of the Forty Days are legendary, that Mt 28 19 in particular only canonizes a later ecclesiastical situation, that its universalism is contrary to the facts of early Christian history, and its Trinitarian formula "foreign to the mouth of Jesus" (see Harnack, History of Dogma, I, 79, and the references there given). It is evident, however, that some of these objections rest upon anti-supernatural presuppositions that really beg the question at issue, and others on conclusions for which real premises are wanting. Over against them all we have to set the positive and weighty fact that from the earliest days of Christianity Baptism appears as the rite of initiation into the fellowship of the church (Acts 2 38.41, et passim), and that even Paul, with all his freedom of thought and spiritual interpretation of the gospel, never questioned its necessity (cf Rom 6 3 ff; 1 Cor 12 13; Eph 4 5). On any other supposition than that of its appointment by Our Lord Himself it is difficult to conceive how within the brief space of years between the death of Jesus and the apostle's earliest references to the subject, the ordinance should not only have originated but have established itself in so absolute a manner for Jewish and gentile Christians alike.

(2) In the case of the Lord's Supper the challenge of its institution by Christ rests mainly upon the fact that the saying, "This do in remembrance of me," is absent from the Mk-Mt text, and is found only in the Supper-narratives of Paul (1 Cor 11 24.25) and his disciple Luke (Lk 22 19). Upon this circumstance large structures of critical hypothesis have been reared. It has been affirmed that in the upper room Jesus was only holding a farewell supper with His disciples, and that it never occurred to Him to institute a feast of commemoration. It has further been maintained that the views of Jesus regarding the speedy consummation of His kingdom make it impossible that He should have dreamed of instituting a sacrament to commemorate His death. The significance of the feast was eschatological merely; it was a pledge of a glorious future hour in the perfected kingdom of God (see Mt 26 29 and parallels). And the theory has even been advanced that the institution of this sacrament as an ordinance of the church designed to commemorate Christ's death was due to the initiative of Paul, who is supposed to have been influenced in this direction by what he had seen in Corinth and elsewhere of the mystery-practices of the Gr world.

All these hypothetical fabrics fall, of course, to the ground if the underlying assumption that Jesus never said, "This do in remembrance of me," is shown to be unwarrantable. And it is unwarrantable to assume that a saying of Jesus which is vouched for by Paul and Luke cannot be authentic because it does not occur in the corresponding narratives of Matthew and Mark. In these narratives, which are highly compressed in any case, the first two evangelists would seem to have confined themselves to setting down those sayings which formed the essential moments of the Supper and gave its symbolic contents. The command of its repetition they may have regarded as sufficiently embodied and expressed in the universal practice of the church from the earliest days. For as to that practice there is no question (Acts 2 42.46; 20 7; 1 Cor 10 16; 11 26), and just as little that it rested upon the belief that Christ had enjoined it. "Every assumption of its having originated in the church from the recollection of intercourse with Jesus at table, and the necessity felt for recalling His death, is precluded" (Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age, II, 279). That the simple historical supper of Jesus with His disciples in the upper room was converted by Paul into an institution for the gentile and Jewish churches alike is altogether inconceivable. The primitive church had its bitter controversies, but there is no trace of any controversy as to the origin and institutional character of the Lord's Supper.

4. Efficacy

In the NT the sacraments are presented as means of grace. Forgiveness (Acts 2 38), cleansing (Eph 5 25 f), spiritual quickening (Col 2 12) are associated with Baptism; the Lord's Supper is declared to be a participation in the body and blood of Christ (1 Cor 10 16). So far all Christians are agreed; but wide divergence shows itself thereafter. According to the doctrine of the Rom church, sacraments are efficacious ex opere operato, i.e. in virtue of a power inherent in themselves as outward acts whereby they communicate saving benefits to those who receive them without opposing any obstacle. The Reformed doctrine, on the other hand, teaches that their efficacy lies not in themselves as outward acts, but in the blessing of Christ and the operation of His Spirit, and that it is conditioned by faith in the recipient. The traditional Lutheran doctrine agrees with the Reformed in affirming that faith is necessary as the condition of saving benefits in the use of the sacraments, but resembles the Rom teaching in ascribing the efficacy of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, not to the attendant working of the Holy Spirit, but to a real inherent and objective virtue resident in them—a virtue, however, which does not lie (as the Rom church says) in the mere elements and actions of the sacraments, but in the power of the Divine word which they embody. See BAPTISM; LORD'S SUPPER.

Terms and Definitions.—זֶבַח, zebhaḥ, “sacrifice”; עֹלָה, 'ōlāh, “burnt offering”; חֲטָאָה, ḥăṭā'āh, חַטָּאת, ḥaṭṭā'th, “sin offering”; אָשָׁם, 'āshām, “guilt” or “trespass offering”; שֶׁלֶם, shelem, שְׁלָמִים, shelāmīm, “peace offerings”; מִנְחָה, minḥāh, “offering,” “present”; זֶבַח שְׁלָמִים, zebhaḥ shelāmīm, “sacrifice of peace offerings”; זֶבַח הַתּוֹדָה, zebhaḥ ha-tōdhāh, “thank offerings”; זֶבַח נְדָבָה, zebhaḥ nedhābhāh, “free-will offerings”; זֶבַח נֶדֶר, zebhaḥ nedher, “votive offerings”; תְּנוּפָה, tenūphāh, “wave offering”; תְּרוּמָה, terūmāh, “heave offering”; קָרְבָּן, ḳorbān, “oblation,” “gift”; אִשֶּׁה, 'ishsheh, “fire offering”; נֶסֶךְ, neṣekh, “drink offering”; כָּלִיל, kālīl, “whole burnt offering”; חַג, ḥagh, “feast”; לְבוֹנָה, lebhōnāh, “frankincense”; קְטוֹרָה, ḳeṭōrāh, קְטוֹרֶת, ḳeṭōreth, “odor,” “incense”; מֶלַח, melaḥ, “salt”; שֶׁמֶן, shemen, “oil”:

Zebhaḥ: a “slaughtered animal,” a “sacrifice,” general term for animals used in sacrifice, including burnt offerings, peace offerings, thank offerings, and all sacrifices offered to the Deity and eaten at the festivals. More particularly it refers to the flesh eaten by the worshippers after the fat parts had been burned on the altar and the priest had received his portion.

'Ōlāh: a “burnt offering,” sometimes whole burnt offering. Derived from the vb. 'ālāh, “to go up.” It may mean “that which goes up to the altar” (Knobel, Wellhausen, Nowack, etc), or “that which goes up in smoke to the sky” (Bähr, Delitzsch, Dillmann, etc); sometimes used synonymously with kālīl (q.v.). The term applies to beast or fowl when entirely consumed upon the altar, the hide of the beast being taken by the priest. This was perhaps the most solemn of the sacrifices, and symbolized worship in the full sense, i.e. adoration, devotion, dedication, supplication, and at times expiation.

Ḥăṭā'āh, ḥaṭṭā'th: a “sin offering,” a special kind, first mentioned in the Mosaic legislation. It is essentially expiatory, intended to restore covenant relations with the Deity. The special features were: (1) the blood must be sprinkled before the sanctuary, put upon the horns of the altar of incense and poured out at the base of the altar of burnt offering; (2) the flesh was holy, not to be touched by worshipper, but eaten by the priest only. The special ritual of the Day of Atonement centers around the sin offering.

'Ashām: “guilt offering,” “trespass offering” (AV; in Isa 53 10, AV and RV “an offering for sin,” ARVm “trespass offering”). A special kind of sin offering introduced in the Mosaic Law and concerned with offences against God and man that could be estimated by a money value and thus covered by compensation or restitution accompanying the offering. A ram of different degrees of value, and worth at least two shekels, was the usual victim, and it must be accompanied by full restitution with an additional fifth of the value of the damage. The leper and Nazirite could offer he-lambs. The guilt toward God was expiated by the blood poured out, and the guilt toward men by the restitution and fine. The calling of the Servant an 'āshām (Isa 53 10) shows the value attached to this offering.

Shelem, shelāmīm: “peace offering,” generally used in the pl., shelāmīm, only once shēlem (Am 5 22). These were sacrifices of friendship expressing or promoting peaceful relations with the Deity, and almost invariably accompanied by a meal or feast, an occasion of great joy. They are sometimes called zebhāḥīm, sometimes zebhaḥ shelāmīm, and were of different kinds, such as zebhaḥ ha-tōdhāh, “thank offerings,” which expressed the gratitude of the giver because of some blessings, zebhaḥ nedhābhāh, “free-will offerings,” bestowed on the Deity out of a full heart, and zebhaḥ nedher, “votive offerings,” which were offered in fulfilment of a vow.

Minḥāh: “meal offering” (RV), “meat offering” (AV), a gift or presentation, at first applied to both bloody and unbloody offerings (Gen 4 5), but in Moses' time confined to cereals, whether raw or roasted, ground to flour or baked and mixed with oil and frankincense. These cereals were the produce of man's labor with the soil, not fruits, etc, and thus represented the necessities and results of life, if not life itself. They were the invariable accompaniment of animal sacrifices, and in one instance could be substituted for them (see Sin Offering). The term minḥāh describes a gift or token of friendship (Isa 39 1), an act of homage (1 S 10 27; 1 K 10 25), tribute (Jgs 3 15.17 f), propitiation to a friend wronged (Gen 32 13.18 [Heb 14 19]), to procure favor or assistance (Gen 43 11 ff; Hos 10 6).

Tenūphāh: “wave offering,” usually the breast, the priest's share of the peace offerings, which was waved before the altar by both offerer and priest together (the exact motion is not certain), symbolic of its presentation to Deity and given back by Him to the offerer to be used in the priests' service.

Tᵉrūmāh: "heave offering," something lifted up, or, properly, separated from the rest and given to the service of the Deity. Usually the right shoulder or thigh was thus separated for the priest. The term is applied to products of the soil, or portion of land separated unto the Divine service, etc.

Ḳorbān: "an oblation," or "offering"; another generic term for all kinds of offerings, animal, vegetable, or even gold and silver. Derived from the vb. ḳārabh, "to draw near," it signifies what is drawn or brought near and given to God.

'Ishsheh: "fire offering," applied to offerings made by fire and usually bloody offerings, but at times to the minḥāh, the sacred bread and frankincense placed on the tables as a memorial, part of which was burned with the frankincense, the bulk, however, going to the priest. The gift was thus presented through fire to the Deity as a sort of etherealized food.

Neṣekh: "drink offering," or "libation," a liquid offering of wine, rarely water, sometimes of oil, and usually accompanying the 'ōlāh, but often with the peace offerings.

Kālīl: "whole burnt offering," the entire animal being burned upon the altar. Sometimes used synonymously with 'ōlāh. A technical term among the Carthaginians.

Ḥagh: a "feast," used metaphorically for a sacrificial feast because the meat of the sacrifices constituted the material of the feast.

Lᵉbhōnāh: "frankincense," "incense," used in combination with the meal offerings and burnt offerings and burned also upon the altar in the holy place. See INCENSE.

Ḳᵉṭōrāh, ḳᵉṭōreth: "smoke," "odor of sacrifice," or incense ascending as a sweet savor and supposed to be pleasing and acceptable to God.

Melaḥ: "salt," used in all sacrifices because of its purifying and preserving qualities.

Shemen: "oil," generally olive oil, used with the meal offerings of cakes and wafers, etc.

Sacrifice is thus a complex and comprehensive term. In its simplest form it may be defined as "a gift to God." It is a presentation to Deity of some material object, the possession of the offerer, as an act of worship. It may be to attain, restore, maintain or to celebrate friendly relations with the Deity. It is religion in action—in early times, almost the whole of religion—an inseparable accompaniment to all religious exercises. Few or many motives may actuate it. It may be wholly piacular and expiatory, or an offering of food as a gift to God; it may be practically a bribe, or a prayer, an expression of dependence, obligation and thanksgiving. It may express repentance, faith, adoration, or all of these combined. It was the one and only way of approach to God. Theophrastus defines it as expressing homage, gratitude and need. Hubert and Mauss define it as "a religious act which by the consecration of the victim modifies the moral state of the sacrificer, or of certain material objects which he has in view, i.e., either confers sanctity or removes it and its analogue, impiety."

II. Origin and Nature of Sacrifices.—The beginnings of sacrifice are hidden in the mysteries of prehistoric life. The earliest narrative in Gen records the fact, but gives no account of the origin and primary idea. The custom is sanctioned by the sacred writings, and later on the long-established custom was adopted and systematized in the Mosaic Law. The practice was almost universal. The Vedas have their elaborate rituals. Some Sem peoples, Greeks, Romans, Africans, and Indians of Mexico offered human sacrifices. It is unknown in Australia, but even there something akin to it exists, for some natives offer a portion of a kind of honey, others offer a pebble or a spear to their god. For this practically universal habit of the race, several solutions are offered.

1. Theory of a Divine Revelation

One view maintains that God Himself initiated the rite by Divine order at the beginnings of human history. Such a theory implies a monotheistic faith on the part of primitive man. This theory was strongly held by many of the Reformed theologians, and was based mainly on the narrative in Gen 4 4 f. Abel offered an acceptable sacrifice, and, according to He 11 4, this was because of his faith. Faber makes a strong plea as follows: Since faith was what made the sacrifice acceptable to God, this faith must have been based upon a positive enactment of God in the past. Without this Divine positive enactment to guarantee its truthfulness, faith, in Abel, would have been superstition. In other words, faith, in order to be truly based and properly directed, must have a revelation from God, a positive expression of the Divine will. Fairbairn, in his Typology, goes further and holds that the skins wherewith Adam and Eve were clothed were from animals which had been slain in sacrifices. This is entirely without support in the narrative. The theory of a Divine order cannot be maintained on the basis of the Bib. narrative. Moreover, it involves certain assumptions regarding the nature of faith and revelation which are not generally held in this age. A revelation is not necessarily a positive Divine command, an external thing, and faith may be just as real and true without such a revelation as with it. That there may have been such a revelation cannot be denied, but it is not a necessary or probable explanation.

2. Theories of a Human Origin

(1) The gift-theory.—By this it is held that sacrifices were originally presents to the deity which the offerer took for granted would be received with pleasure and even gratitude. Good relations would thus be established with the god and favors would be secured. Such motives, while certainly true among many heathen people, were obviously based upon low conceptions of the deity. They were either Nature-spirits, ancestral ghosts or fetiches which needed what was given, and of course the god was placed under obligations and his favor obtained. Or, the god may have been conceived of as a ruler, a king or chief, as was the custom in the East.

Cicero vouches for such a view when he says: "Let not the impious dare to appease the gods with gifts. Let them hearken to Plato, who warns them that there can be no doubt what God's disposition to them will be, since even a good man will refuse to accept presents from the wicked" (HDB, IV, 331*a*). This view of sacrifice prevails in classical literature. Spencer therefore thinks it is self-evident that this was the idea of primitive man. Tylor and Herbert Spencer also find the origin of sacrifices in the idea of a gift, whether to the deity or to dead ancestors, food being placed for them, and this afterward comes to be regarded as a sacrifice. Such a view gives no account of the peculiar value attached to the blood, or to the burnt offerings. It may account for some heathen systems of sacrifice, but can help in no degree in understanding the Bib. sacrifices.

(2) The magic theory.—There are two slightly variant forms of this: (a) that of R. C. Thompson (Sem Magic, Its Origins and Developments, 175–218), who holds that a sacrificial animal serves as a substitute victim offered to a demon whose activity has brought the offerer into trouble; the aim of the priest is to entice or drive the malignant spirit out of the sick or sinful man into the sacrificial victim where it can be isolated or destroyed; (b) that of L. Marillier, who holds that sacrifice in its origin is essentially a magical rite. The liberation of a magical force by the effusion of the victim's blood will bend the god to the will of the man. From this arose under the "cult of the dead" the gift-theory of sacrifice. Men sought to ally themselves with the god in particular by purifying a victim and effecting communion with the god by the application of the blood to the altar, or by the sacrifice of the animal and the contact of the sacrificer with its blood. Such theories give no account of the burnt offerings, meal offerings and sin offerings, disconnect them entirely from any sense of sin or estrangement from God, and divest them of all piacular value. They may account for certain depraved and heathen systems, but not for the Biblical.

(3) The table-bond theory.—Ably advocated by Wellhausen and W. R. Smith, this view holds that sacrifices were meals which the worshippers and the god shared, partaking of the same food and thus establishing a firmer bond of fellowship between them. Sykes (Nature of Sacrifices, 75) first advocated this, holding that the efficacy of sacrifices "is the fact that eating and drinking were the known and ordinary symbols of friendship and were the usual rites in engaging in covenants and leagues." Thus sacrifices are more than gifts; they are deeds of hospitality which knit god and worshipper together. W. R. Smith has expounded the idea into the notion that the common meal unites physically those who partake of it. Though this view may contain an element of truth in regard to certain Arabian customs, it does not help much to account for Bible sacrifices. As A. B. Davidson says, "It fails utterly to account for the burnt offering, which was one of the earliest, most solemn and at times the most important of all the sacrifices."

(4) The sacramental communion theory.—This is a modification of the table-bond theory. The basis of it is the totemistic idea of reverencing an animal which is believed to share with man the Divine nature. On certain solemn occasions this animal would be sacrificed to furnish a feast. At this meal, according to men's savage notions, they literally "ate the god," and thus incorporated into themselves the physical, the intellectual and the moral qualities which characterized the animal. If the Divine life dwelt in certain animals, then a part of that precious life would be distributed among all the people (*RS*², 313). In some cases the blood is drunk by the worshippers, thus imbibing the life. Sometimes, as in the case of the sacred camel, they devoured the quivering flesh before the animal was really dead, and the entire carcase was eaten up before morning.

The brilliant work of W. R. Smith has not been universally accepted. L. Marillier has criticized it along several lines. It is by no means certain that totemism prevailed so largely among Semites and there is no evidence of its existence in Israel. Also, if an original bond of friendship existed between the god and the kin, there is no need to maintain it by such sacrificial rites. There is no clear instance of this having been done. If on the other hand there was no common bond between the god and the people but that of a common meal, it does not appear that the god is a totem god. There is no reason why the animal should have been a totem. In any case, this idea of sacrifice could hardly have been anything but a slow growth, and consequently not the origin of sacrifice. Hubert and Mauss also point out that W. R. Smith is far from having established the historical or the logical connection between the common meal and the other kinds of sacrifices. Under piacula he confuses purification, propitiation and expiations. His attempts to show that purifications of magical character are late and not sacrificial do not succeed. Smith's theory is mainly the sacramental, though he does recognize the honorific and piacular element. The theory may be applicable to some of the heathen or savage feasts of the Arabs, but not to the practices of the Hebrews (see Enc Brit, XXIII, 981).

(5) The homage theory.—This has been advocated by Warburton and F. D. Maurice. The idea is that sacrifices were originally an expression of homage and dependence. Man naturally felt impelled to seek closer communion with God, not so much from a sense of guilt as from a sense of dependence and a desire to show homage and obedience. In giving expression to this, primitive man had recourse to acts rather than words and thoughts. Thus sacrifice was an acted prayer, rather than a prayer in words. It was an expression of his longings and aspirations, his reverence and submission. There is much truth in this view; the elements of prayer—dependence and submission—enter into some sacrifices, the burnt offerings in particular; but it does not account for all kinds of offerings.

(6) The piacular theory.—This holds that sacrifices are fundamentally expiatory or atoning, and the death of the beast is a vicarious expiation of the sins of the offerer. Hubert and Mauss admit that in all sacrifices there are some ideas of purchase or substitution, though these may not have issued from some primitive form. The unifying principle in all sacrifices is that the Divine is put in communication with the profane by the intermediary—the victim—which may be piacular or honorific. It is thus a messenger, a means of divination, a means of alimenting the eternal life of the species, a source of magical energy which the rite diffuses over objects in its neighborhood. Westermarck (Origin of Moral Ideas) makes the original idea in sacrifice a piaculum, a substitute for the offerer.

This view is the most simple, the most natural, and the only one that can explain certain sacrifices. Man felt himself under liability to punishment or death. The animal was his, it had life, it was of value, and perchance the god would accept that life in place of his. He felt that it would be accepted, and thus the animal was sacrificed. The offerer in a sense gives up part of himself. The beast must be his own; no sacrifice can be made of another person's property (2 S 24 24*a*). The true spirit of sacrifice appears in a willingness to acknowledge God's right to what is best and dearest (Gen 12).

Objection is raised to this by A. B. Davidson (OT Theology), Paterson (HDB, IV, 331) and others, on the ground that such an origin represents too advanced a stage of ethical thought and reflection for primitive man. We question seriously whether this be an advanced stage of moral reflection. On the contrary, it represents a very simple and primitive stage. The feeling that sin of some kind is never absent from human life, and that its true penalty is death, has been inseparable from the human heart's sense of sin. What could be more simple and natural than to take an innocent animal and offer it in place of himself, hoping that the Deity would accept it instead? Nor is there much force in Professor Paterson's objection that sacrifices were preponderantly joyous in character and therefore could not be offered as an expiation. This joyous character belongs to such sacrifices as peace offerings and thank offerings, but does not belong to the 'ōlāh and others. In most cases the joyous feast followed the killing of the animal by which the expiation was accomplished, and the feast was joyous because atonement had been made. In fact, many sacrifices were of the most solemn character and represented the deepest and most serious emotions of the heart.

(7) Originating in religious instincts.—Neither the theory of an objective Divine revelation, nor of a human origin will account for the universality and variety of sacrifices. The truth lies in a proper combination of the two. The notion of offering a gift to the Deity arose out of the religious instincts of the human heart, which in an early period had a consciousness of something wrong between itself and God, and that this something would mean death sooner or later. Added to these true instincts was the Omnipresent Spirit to guide men in giving expression. What could be more simple and primitive than to offer something possessing life? Of course the notion originated in simple and childlike ideas of God, and its real motive was not to gratify God by sharing a meal with Him, or to gain His favor by a bribe, but to present Him with something that represented a part of the offerer which might be accepted in his stead. Thus sacrifices became the leading features of the religious life of primitive man. Naturally other ideas would be added, such as a gift of food by fire to the Deity, the peace offerings, etc, to celebrate the friendly relations with God, the thank offerings, the sin offerings, etc, all of which naturally and logically developed from the primitive idea. It might be expected that there would be many corruptions and abuses, that the sense of sin would be obscured or lost among some peoples, and the idea of sacrifice correspondingly degraded. Such has been the case, and as well might we try to understand man at his best by studying the aboriginal tribes of Africa and Australia, or the inmates of asylums and penitentiaries, as to attempt to understand the Bible ideas in sacrifices by studying the cults of those heathen and savage tribes of Semites, etc.

III. Classification of Sacrifices.—Maimonides was among the first to classify them, and he divided them into two kinds: (1) Those on behalf of the whole congregation, fixed by statute, time, number and ritual being specified. This would include burnt, meal and peace offerings with their accompaniments. (2) Those on behalf of the individual, whether by virtue of his connection with the community or as a private person. These would be burnt, sin and guilt offerings with their accompaniments.

1. Maimonides

2. W. R. Smith and Others

Others, such as W. R. Smith, classify them as: (1) honorific, or designed to render homage, devotion, or adoration, such as burnt, meal and peace offerings; (2) piacular, designed to expiate or make atonement for the errors of the people, i.e. burnt, sin and guilt offerings; (3) communistic, intended to establish the bond between the god and the worshipper, such as peace offerings.

3. Oehler

Oehler divides them into two classes, viz.: (1) those which assume that the covenant relation is undisturbed, such as peace offerings; (2) those intended to do away with any disturbance in the relation and to set it right, such as burnt, sin and guilt offerings.

4. Paterson

Professor Paterson and others divide them into three: (1) animal sacrifices, burnt, peace, sin and guilt offerings; (2) vegetable sacrifices, meal offerings, shewbread, etc; (3) liquid and incense offerings; wine, oil, water, etc.

5. Wiener

H. M. Wiener offers a more suggestive and scientific division (Essays on Pentateuchal Criticism, 200 f): (1) customary lay offerings, such as had from time immemorial been offered on rude altars of earth or stone, without priest, used and regulated by Moses and in more or less general use until the exile, viz. burnt, meal and peace offerings; (2) statutory individual offerings, introduced by Moses, offered by laymen with priestly assistance and at the religious capital, i.e. burnt, peace, meal, sin and guilt offerings; (3) statutory national offerings introduced by Moses and offered by the priest at the religious capital, viz. burnt, meal, peace and sin offerings.

IV. Sacrifices in the Pre-Mosaic Age.—Out of the obscure period of origins emerged the dimly lighted period of ancient history. Everywhere sacrifices existed and sometimes abounded as an essential part of religion. The spade of the archaeologist, and the researches of scholars help us understand the pre-Mosaic period.

1. In Egypt

In Egypt—probably from the beginning of the 4th millennium BC—there were sacrifices and sacrificial systems. Temples at Abydos, Thebes, On, etc, were great priestly centers with high priests, lower priests, rituals and sacrifices in abundance. Animals, birds, meal, wine and beer, incense and flowers were offered, for both the dead and the gods, chiefly supplies, sometimes expiatory. The sacrifices were not burned and human beings were not offered (Kyle, Recueil de Travaux, XXVII). In these offerings there were many resemblances to the Heb gifts, and many significant exceptions. Moses would be somewhat familiar with these practices though not with the details of the ritual. He would appreciate the unifying power of a national religious center. It is inconceivable that in such an age a national leader and organizer like Moses would not take special care to institute such a system.

2. In Babylonia

In Babylonia, from the year 3000 BC or thereabouts, according to E. Meyer (Geschichte des Alterthums), there were many centers of worship such as Eridu, Nippur, Agade, Erech, Ur, Nisin, Larsa, Sippar, etc. These and others continued for centuries with elaborate systems of worship, sacrifices, temples, priesthoods, etc. Considerably over 100 temples and sanctuaries are mentioned on inscriptions, and several hundreds in the lit. and tablets, so that Babylonia was studded with temples and edifices for the gods. At all these, sacrifices were constantly offered—animal and vegetable. A long list of the offerings of King Gudea includes oxen, sheep, goats, lambs, fish, birds (i.e. eagles and doves), dates, milk, greens (Jastrow, in HDB, V, 580 f, s.v.). The sacrifices provided an income for the priests, as did the Mosaic system at a later time. It had long passed the stage when it was supposed to furnish a meal for the god. A sacrifice always accompanied a consultation with a priest, and was really an assessment for the services rendered. It was not a voluntary offering or ritualistic observance. The priests on their own behalf offered a daily sacrifice, as in the Mosaic Law, and likewise on special occasions, to insure the good will of the gods they served. It seems certain that in some of the larger centers of worship animals were offered up twice a day, morning and evening. At these sacrifices certain portions were consumed on the altar, the rest belonging to the priest. The similarity of much of this to the Mosaic institutions is obvious. That the culture and civilization of Babylon was known to Egypt and Israel with other nations is shown clearly by the Am Tab. Special sacrifices on special occasions were offered in Babylonia as in Israel. As Jastrow says, "In the Heb codes, both as regards the purely legal portions and those sections dealing with religious ritual, Bab methods of legal procedure and of ritual developed in Bab temples must be taken into consideration as determining factors." We do not doubt that Moses made use of many elements found in the Egyp and Bab systems, and added to or subtracted from or purified as occasion required. As sacrificial systems and ritual had been in use more than a millennium before Moses, there is absolutely no need to suppose that Israel's ritual was a thousand years in developing, and was completed after the exile. To do so is to turn history upside down.

3. Nomads and Tribes of Arabia and Syria

Among the nomads and tribes of Arabia and Syria, sacrifices had been common for millenniums before Moses. The researches of Wellhausen and W. R. Smith are valuable here, whatever one may think of their theories. The offerings were usually from the flocks and herds, sometimes from the spoils taken in war which had been appropriated as their own. The occasions were many and various, and the ritual was very simple. A rude altar of earth or stone, or one stone, a sacred spot, the offerer killing the victim and burning all, or perhaps certain parts and eating the remainder with the clan or family, constituted the customary details. Sometimes wild animals were offered. Babylonians, Phoenicians and Arabs offered gazelles, but the Hebrews did not. Arabs would sometimes sacrifice a captive youth, while the Carthaginians chose some of the fairest of the captives for offerings by night. Assyr kings sometimes sacrificed captive kings. The Canaanites and others constantly sacrificed children, esp. the firstborn.

4. Cain and Abel

The account of the offerings of Cain and Abel (Gen 4 4 f) shows that the ceremony dates from almost the beginnings of the human race. The custom of offering the firstlings and first-fruits had already begun. Arabian tribes later had a similar custom. Cain's offering was cereal and is called minḥāh, "a gift" or "presentation." The same term is applied to Abel's. There is no hint that the bloody sacrifice was in itself better than the unbloody one, but it is shown that sacrifice without a right attitude of heart is not acceptable to God. This same truth is emphasized by the prophets and others, and is needed in this day as much as then. In this case the altars would be of the common kind and no priest was needed. The sacrifices were an act of worship, adoration, dependence, prayer and possibly propitiation.

5. Noah

The sacrifices of Noah followed and celebrated the epochal and awe-inspiring event of leaving the ark and beginning life anew. He offered burnt offerings of all the clean animals (Gen 8 20 ff). On such a solemn occasion only an ʿōlāh would suffice. The custom of using domestic animals had arisen at this time. The sacrifices expressed adoration, recognition of God's power and sovereignty, and a gift to please Him, for it is said He smelled a sweet savor and was pleased. It was an odor of satisfaction or restfulness. Whether or not the idea of expiation was included is difficult to prove.

6. Abraham

Abraham lived at a time when sacrifices and religion were virtually identical. No mention is made of his offering at Ur or Ḥaran, but on his arrival at Shechem he erected an altar (Gen 12 7). At Beth-el also (ver 8), and on his return from Egypt he worshipped there (Gen 13 4). Such sacrifices expressed adoration and prayer and probably propitiation. They constituted worship, which is a complex exercise. At Hebron he built an altar (Gen 13 18), officiating always as his own priest. In 15 4 ff he offers a "covenant" sacrifice, when the animals were slain, divided, the parts set opposite each other, and prepared for the appearance of the other party to the covenant. The exact idea in the killing of these animals may be difficult to find, but the effect is to give the occasion great solemnity and the highest religious sanction. What was done with the carcases afterward is not told. That animals were slain for food with no thought of sacrifice is shown by the narrative in ch 18, where Abraham had a calf slain for the meal. This is opposed to one of the chief tenets of the Wellhausen school, which maintains that all slaughtering of animals was sacrificial until the 7th cent. BC. In ch 22 Abraham attempts to offer up Isaac as a burnt offering, as was probably the custom of his neighbors. That he attempted it shows that the practice was not shocking to his ethical nature. It tested the strength of his devotion to God, shows the right spirit in sacrifices, and teaches for all time that God does not desire human sacrifice—a beast will do. What God does want is the obedient heart. Abraham continued his worship at Beer-sheba (Gen 21 33).

7. Book of Job

Whatever may be the date of the writing of the Book of Job, the saint himself is represented as living in the Patriarchal age. He constantly offered sacrifices on behalf of his children (1 5), "sanctifying" them. His purpose no doubt was to atone for possible sin. The sacrifices were mainly expiatory. This is true also of the sacrifices of his friends (42 7–9).

8. Isaac

Isaac seems to have had a permanent altar at Beer-sheba and to have regularly offered sacrifices. Adoration, expiation and supplication would constitute his chief motives (Gen 26 25).

9. Jacob

Jacob's first recorded sacrifice was the pouring of the oil upon the stone at Beth-el (Gen 28 18). This was consecration or dedication in recognition of the awe-inspiring presence of the Deity. After his covenant with Laban he offered sacrifices (zᵉbhāḥim) and they ate bread (Gen 31 54). At Shechem, Jacob erected an altar (Gen 33 20). At Beth-el (35 7) and at Beer-sheba he offered sacrifices to Isaac's God (46 1).

10. Israel in Egypt

While the Israelites were in Egypt they would be accustomed to spring sacrifices and spring feasts, for these had been common among the Arabs and Syrians, etc, for centuries. Nabataean inscriptions testify to this. Egyp sacrifices have been mentioned (see above). At these spring festivals it was probably customary to offer the firstlings of the flocks (cf Ex 13 15). At the harvest festivals sacrificial feasts were celebrated. It was to some such feast Moses said Israel as a people wished to go in the wilderness (Ex 3 18; 5 3 ff; 7 16). Pharaoh understood and asked who was to go (Ex 10 8). Moses demanded flocks and herds for the feast (10 9). Pharaoh would keep the flocks, etc (10 24), but Moses said they must offer sacrifices and burnt offerings (10 25 f).

The sacrifice of the Passover soon occurs (Ex 12 3–11). That the Hebrews had been accustomed to sacrifice their own firstborn at this season has no support and is altogether improbable (Frazer, Golden Bough^{3}, pt. III, 175 f). The whole ceremony is very primitive and has retained its primitiveness to the end. The choosing of the lamb or kid, the killing at a certain time, the family gathered in the home, the carcase roasted whole, eaten that night, and the remainder, if any, burned, while the feasters had staff in hand, etc, all this was continued. The blood in this case protected from the Deity, and the whole ceremony was "holy" and only for the circumcised. Frazer in his Golden Bough gives a very different interpretation.

11. Jethro

As a priest of Midian Jethro was an expert in sacrificing. On meeting Moses and the people he offered both 'ōlāh and zᵉbhāḥim and made a feast (Ex 18 12).

12. Summary and Conclusions

From the above it is evident that sacrifices were almost the substance of religion in that ancient world. From hilltops and temples innumerable, the smoke of sacrifices was constantly rising heavenward. Burnt offerings and peace offerings were well known. Moses, in establishing a religion, must have a sacrificial system. He had abundance of materials to choose from, and under Divine guidance would adopt such rules and regulations as the pedagogic plans and purposes of God would require in preparing for better things.

V. The Mosaic Sacrificial System.—The fundamental function of Moses' work was to establish the covenant between Israel and God.

1. The Covenant Sacrifice

This important transaction took place at Sinai and was accompanied by solemn sacrifices. The foundation principle was obedience, not sacrifices (Ex 19 4–8). No mention is made of these at the time, as they were incidental—mere by-laws to the constitution. The center of gravity in Israel's religion is now shifted from sacrifices to obedience and loyalty to Jeh. Sacrifices were helps to that end and without obedience were worthless. This is in exact accordance with Jer 7 21 ff. God did not speak unto the fathers at this time about sacrifices; He did speak about obedience.

The covenant having been made, the terms and conditions are laid down by Moses and accepted by the people (Ex 24 3). The Decalogue and Covenant Code are given, an altar is built, burnt and peace offerings of oxen are slain by young men servants of Moses, not by priests, and blood is sprinkled on the altar (24 4 ff). The blood would symbolize the community of life between Jeh and Israel, and consecrated the altar. The Law was read, the pledge again given, and Moses sprinkled the representatives of the people, consecrating them also (24 7 f). Ascending the mount, they had a vision of God, held a feast before Him, showing the joys and privileges of the new relationship. The striking feature of these ceremonies is the use of the blood. It is expiatory and consecrating, it is life offered to God, it consecrates the altar and the people: they are now acceptable to God and dare approach Him and feast with Him. There is no idea of God's drinking the blood. The entire ritual is far removed from the crass features of common Sem worship.

2. The Common Altars

In the Covenant Code, which the people accepted, the customary altars are not abolished, but regulated (Ex 20 24 ff). This law expressly applies to the time when they shall be settled in Canaan. 'In the whole place where I cause my name to be remembered,' etc (ver 24 m). No need to change the reading to "in every place where I cause," etc, as the Wellhausen school does for obvious reasons. All the land was eligible. On such rude altars sacrifices were allowed. This same law is implied in Dt 16 21, a passage either ignored or explained away by the Wellhausen school (see Wiener, Essays in Pentateuchal Criticism, 200 f). Moses commanded Joshua in accordance with it (Dt 27 5 ff). Joshua, Gideon, Jephthah, Samuel, Saul, David, Elijah and many others used such altars. There were altars at Shechem (Josh 24 1.26), Mizpah in Gilead (Jgs 11 11), Gilgal (1 S 13 9). High places were chiefly used until the times of Hezekiah and Josiah, when they were abolished because of their corruptions, etc. All such altars were perfectly legitimate and in fact necessary, until there was a central capital and sanctuary in Jerus. The customary burnt and peace offerings with the worshipper officiating were the chief factors. Heathen sacrifices and the use of heathen altars were strictly forbidden (Ex 22 20 [Heb 19]; 34 15).

3. The Consecration of Aaron and His Sons

The altar used at the consecration of Aaron and his sons was a "horned" or official altar, the central one. The offerings were a bullock, two rams, unleavened bread, etc (Ex 29 1–4), and were brought to the door of the sanctuary. The ritual consisted of Aaron laying his hand on the bullock's head, designating it as his substitute (29 10), killing it before the tent of meeting (ver 11), smearing some blood on the horns of the altar, and pouring the rest at its base (ver 12). The blood consecrated the altar, the life was given as atonement for sins, the fat parts were burned upon the altar as food for God, and the flesh and remainder were burned without the camp (vs 13.14). This is a sin offering—ḥaṭṭā'th—the first time the term is used. Probably introduced by Moses, it was intended to be piacular and to "cover" possible sin. One ram was next slain, blood was sprinkled round about the altar, flesh was cut in pieces, washed and piled on the altar, then burned as an offering by fire ('ishsheh) unto God as a burnt offering, an odor of a sweet savor (vs 15–18). The naïve and primitive nature of this idea is apparent. The other ram, the ram of consecration, is slain, blood is smeared on Aaron's right ear, thumb and great toe; in the case of his sons likewise. The blood is sprinkled on the altar round about; some upon the garments of Aaron and his sons (vs 19–21). Certain parts are waved before Jeh along with the bread, and are then burned upon the altar (vs 22–25). The breast is offered as a wave offering (tᵉnūphāh), and the right thigh or shoulder as a heave offering (tᵉrūmāh). These portions here first mentioned were the priests' portion for all time to come, although this particular one went to Moses, since he officiated (vs 26–30). The flesh must be boiled in a holy place, and must be eaten by Aaron and his sons only, and at the sanctuary. What was left till morning must be burned (vs 31–34). Consecrated to a holy service it was dangerous for anyone else to touch it, or the Divine wrath would flame forth. The same ceremony on each of the seven days atoned for, cleansed and consecrated the altar to the service of Jeh, and it was most holy (vs 35–37). The altar of incense is ordered (Ex 30 1), and Aaron is to put the blood of the sin offering once a year upon its horns to consecrate it.

4. Sacrifices before the Golden Calf

When the golden calf was made an altar was erected, burnt and peace offerings were presented. From the latter a feast was made, the people followed the usual habits at such festivals, went to excess and joined in revelry. Moses' ear quickly detected the nature of the sounds. The covenant was now broken and no sacrifice was available for this sin. Vengeance was executed on 3,000 Israelites. Moses mightily interceded with God. A moral reaction was begun; new tables of the Law were made with more stringent laws against idols and idol worship (Ex 32 1–35).

5. Law of the Burnt Offering (ʽōlāh)

At the setting-up of the tabernacle burnt and meal offerings were sacrificed (Ex 40 29). The law of the burnt offering is found in Lev 1. Common altars and customary burnt offerings needed no minute regulations, but this ritual was intended primarily for the priest, and was taught to the people as needed. They were for the statutory individual and national offering upon the "horned" altar before the sanctuary. Already the daily burnt offerings of the priests had been provided for (Ex 29 38–42). The burnt offering is here called ḳorbān, "oblation."

(1) The ritual for the offerer (Lev 1 3–17).—This may have been from the herd or flock or fowls, brought to the tent of meeting; hands were laid (heavily) upon its head designating it as the offerer's substitute, it was killed, flayed and cut in pieces. If of the flock, it was to be killed on the north side of the altar; if a fowl, the priest must kill it.

(2) The ritual for the priest (Lev 1 3–17).—If a bullock or of the flock, the priest was to sprinkle the blood round about the altar, put on the fire, lay the wood and pieces of the carcase, wash the inwards, legs, etc, and burn it all as a sweet savor to God. If a fowl, he must wring the neck, drain out the blood on the side of the altar, cast the crop, filth, etc, among the ashes, rend the wings without dividing the bird and burn the carcase on the altar.

(3) General laws for the priest.—The burnt offering must be continued every morning and every evening (Ex 29 38 f; Nu 28 3–8). At the fulfilment of his vow the Nazirite must present it before God and offer it upon the altar through the priest (Nu 6 14.16): on the Sabbath, two lambs (Nu 28 9); on the first of the month, two bullocks, one ram and seven lambs (Nu 28 11); on the day of first-fruits, the same (Nu 28 27); on the 1st day of the 7th month, one bullock, one ram, seven lambs (Nu 29 8); on the 15th day, 13 bullocks, two rams, 14 lambs, the number of bullocks diminishing daily until the 7th day, when seven bullocks, two rams, 14 lambs were offered (Nu 29 12–34); on the 22nd day of this month one bullock, one ram and seven lambs were offered (Nu 29 35.36). Non-Israelites were permitted to offer the ʽōlāh, but no other sacrifices (Lev 17 8; 22 18.25).

(4) Laws in Dt (12 6.13.14.27; 27 6*).—Anticipating a central sanctuary in the future, the lawgiver counsels the people to bring their offerings there (12 6.11); they must be careful not to offer them in any place (ver 13), but must patronize the central sanctuary (ver 14). In the meantime common altars and customary sacrifices were allowable and generally necessary (16 21; 27 6).

6. Law of the Meal Offering (minḥāh)

The term "meal offering" is here confined to offerings of flour or meal, etc (AV "meat-offering"), and was first used at the consecration of Aaron and his sons (Ex 29 41). These must not be offered on the altar of incense (Ex 30 9); were used at the completion of the tabernacle (40 29); and always with the morning and evening burnt offerings.

(1) The ritual for the offerer (Lev 2 1–16).—It must be of fine flour, with oil and frankincense added, and brought to the priest; if baked in the oven, unleavened cakes mingled with oil, or wafers and oil; if of the baking pan, fine flour mingled with oil parted into pieces and oil thereon; if of the frying pan, the same ingredients. Leaven and honey must never be used as they quickly become corrupt. Every offering must be seasoned with salt. If of the first-fruits (bikkūrīm), it should consist of corn in the ear, parched with oil and frankincense upon it.

(2) The ritual for the priest (Lev 2 1–16).—This required him to take out a handful with the oil and frankincense thereon and burn it as a memorial upon the altar. The remainder was holy and belonged to the priest. Of the cakes, after bringing them to the altar, he was to take a portion, burn it and appropriate the remainder; the same with the first-fruits.

(3) General laws for the priest (Lev 6 14–18 [Heb 7–11], etc).—He might eat his portion without leaven in the holy place. At his anointing Aaron offered his own oblation of fine flour—$\frac{1}{10}$ of an ephah, one-half in the morning and one-half in the evening. If baked, it must be with oil. This meal offering must all be burnt; none could be eaten. With the sin and guilt offerings every meal offering baked in any way belongs to the priest (Lev 7 9.10; 10 12; Nu 18 9). The meal offerings accompanied the other offerings on all important occasions, such as the consecration of Aaron (Lev 9 4.17); cleansing of a leper (Lev 14 10.20.21.31); feast of first-fruits

(Lev 23 13); Pentecost (Lev 23 16); set feasts (Lev 23 37). Special charge was given to Eleazar to care for the continual meal offerings (Nu 4 16). The Nazirite must offer it (Nu 6 15.17). When the tribes presented their offerings, meal offerings were always included (Nu 7 13.19, etc); when the Levites were set apart (Nu 8 8); with vows of freewill offerings (Nu 15 4.6); with the sin offerings (15 24); at all the several seasons (Nu 28 5—29 39). A special form was the "showbread" (bread of memorial). Twelve loaves were to be placed in two rows or heaps of six each on a pure table in the holy place, with frankincense on each pile or row. These were to remain for one week and then to be eaten by the priests. They were an offering of food by fire, though probably only the frankincense was actually burned (Lev 24 5 f).

7. Law of the Peace Offering

The peace offerings indicated right relations with God, expressing good-fellowship, gratitude and obligation. The common altars were fitted for their use (Ex 20 24), as feasts had been thus celebrated from time immemorial. At the feast before God on the Mount, peace offerings provided the food (Ex 24 5); also before the golden bull (Ex 32 6). The wave and heave offerings were portions of these.

(1) The ritual for the offerer (Lev 3 1–17).—The offering might be a bullock, a lamb, or a goat, either male or female, latitude being allowed in this case. The ritual was the same as in the case of the burnt offering (see above).

(2) The ritual for the priest (Lev 3 1–17).—Blood must be sprinkled on the altar round about, the caul, the liver and the kidneys must be taken away and the fat parts burned on the altar; the fat tail of the lamb must also be burned. These portions were offerings of food by fire to the Deity. The ritual for a goat was the same as for a bullock.

(3) General laws for the priest (Lev 6 12 [Heb 5]; 7 1 ff).—The fat was to be burned on the altar of burnt offering. If it was a thank offering (zebhaḥ ha-tōdhāh), it must have unleavened cakes with oil, cakes mingled with oil and fine flour soaked. Cakes of leavened bread might be offered, and one cake was to be a heave offering to the priest. The flesh was to be eaten that day, none was to be left till morning (Lev 22 30). If it was a votive offering (zebhaḥ nedher) or a freewill offering (zebhaḥ nᵉdhābhāh), it might be eaten on the first and second days, but not on the third day; it should then be an abomination (Lev 7 18 f). If eaten then by anyone, that person was to be cut off from the community. Of all peace offerings the wave-breast and heave-thigh belong to the priest (Lev 7 29–34), the remainder was to be eaten by the worshippers. At Aaron's consecration an ox and a ram were the peace offerings (Lev 9 4. 18.22). The priest's portion was to be eaten in a clean place by the priest's family (Lev 10 14). When Israel should have a central sanctuary, all were to be brought there (Lev 17 4.5). When they had no central place, the common altars would suffice. All peace offerings must be made in an acceptable manner (Lev 19 5). Votive offerings must be perfect (Lev 22 18–22), but certain imperfections are allowable in freewill offerings (ver 23). At Pentecost two he-lambs of the first year could be offered as peace offerings (Lev 23 19). The Nazirite at the end of his separation must offer one ram for a peace offering with unleavened bread (Nu 6 14.17), and the hair shaved from his head must be burned under the peace offerings (6 18). This hair was regarded as a thing having life and offered as a sacrifice by other nations. The various tribes brought peace offerings (ch 7, passim), and at the feast of trumpets the people were to rejoice and blow trumpets over the peace offerings (10 10). Some further regulations are given (15 9 f).

8. The Sin Offering

The sin offering was a sacrifice of a special kind, doubtless peculiar to Israel and first mentioned at the consecration of Aaron and his sons. It is not then spoken of as an innovation. It was of special value as an expiatory sacrifice.

(1) Use at the consecration of Aaron and his sons (Ex 29 10 ff).—A bullock was killed before the altar, some blood was put upon the horns of the altar by Moses, the rest was poured out at the base. The fat of the inwards was burned upon the altar, the flesh and skin were burned without the camp. Every day during the consecration this was done (Ex 29 36).

(2) The law of the sin offering (Lev 4 1–35; 6 24–30, etc).—(a) The occasion and meaning: Specifically to atone for unwitting sins, sins of error (shᵉghāghāh), mistakes or rash acts, unknown at the time, but afterward made known. There were gradations of these for several classes of offenders: the anointed priest (vs 3–12), the whole congregation (vs 13–21), a ruler (vs 22–26), one of the common people (vs 27–35), forswearing (5 1), touching an unclean thing (ver 2) or the uncleanness of man (ver 3), or rashly swearing in ignorance (ver 4). For conscious and wilful violations of the Law, no atonement was possible, with some exceptions, for which provision was made in the guilt offerings (see below).

(b) The ritual for the offerer (Lev 4 1–5.13, etc): The anointed priest must offer a bullock at the tent of meeting, lay his hands upon it and slay it before Jeh. The congregation was also required to bring a young bullock before the tent of meeting, the elders were to lay hands upon it and slay it before Jeh. The ruler must bring a he-goat and do the same. One of the common people might bring a she-goat or lamb and present it in the same manner. If too poor for these, two turtledoves or young pigeons, one for a sin offering and one for a burnt offering, would suffice. If too poor for these, the tenth part of an ephah of fine flour without oil or frankincense would suffice.

(c) The ritual for the priest (Lev 4 1–5.13, etc): He must bring the bullock's blood to the tent of meeting, dip his finger into it and sprinkle blood 7 t before the veil of the sanctuary, and put some on the horns of the altar of incense, but most of the blood must be poured out at the base of the altar. The fat must be burned upon the altar, all the rest of the carcase must be carried to a clean place without the camp and burned. In the case of the whole congregation, the ritual is the same. In the case of a ruler, the blood is to be put upon the horns of the altar of burnt offering, not the altar of incense. In the case of one of the common people, the ritual is similar to that of the ruler. In both the latter cases the carcase belonged to the priest. If a bird, the priest must wring off its head, sprinkle some blood on the side of the altar and pour the rest at the base. Nothing is said of the disposal of the carcase. If of fine flour, the priest must take out a handful and burn it upon the altar, keeping the remainder for himself. The use of fine flour for an expiatory sacrifice is evidently exceptional and intended to be so. Though life was not given, yet a necessity of life—that which represented life—was offered.

(d) General laws for the priest (Lev 6 24–30): The sin offering was to be slain in the same place as the burnt offering. It was most holy, and the priest alone might eat what was left of the ram, pigeon or flour, in the holy place. Whatever touched it was to be holy, any garment sprinkled with the blood must be washed in a holy place, earthen vessels used must be broken, and brazen vessels thoroughly scoured and rinsed.

(e) Special uses of the sin offering: (i) The consecration of Aaron and his sons (Lev 8 2.14.15) was similar to that of Lev 4 11.12, only Moses was to kill the offering and put the blood on the horns of the altar. On the 8th day a bull-calf was offered (9 2), and the congregation offered a he-goat (ver 3). In this case Aaron performed the ceremony, as in Lev 4 11.12. Moses complained that they had not eaten the flesh of the calf and goat in the sanctuary, since that was requisite when the blood was not brought into the sanctuary (Lev 10 16–20).

(ii) Purifications from uncleannesses required after childbirth a young pigeon or turtledove (Lev 12

6–8). The leper must bring a guilt offering (a special kind of sin offering), a he-lamb (Lev 14 12–14.19); if too poor for a lamb, a turtledove or young pigeon (vs 22.31). Special use of the blood is required (ver 25). In uncleanness from issues a sin offering of a turtledove or young pigeon must be offered by the priest (Lev 15 15.30).

(iii) On the Day of Atonement (Lev 16 1–28) Aaron must take a bullock for himself and house, two he-goats for the people, present the goats at the sanctuary, cast losts, one for Jeh, as a sin offering, the other for Azazel, to be sent into the wilderness. The bullock was killed, sweet incense was burned within the rail, blood was sprinkled on the mercy-seat and before it 7 times. The one he-goat was killed and a similar ceremony was performed. Blood must be put on the horns of the altar and sprinkled 7 t about it. The other goat was presented, hands were laid on it, the sins of all confessed and put upon the goat, and it was sent into the wilderness. The carcase of the bullock and he-goat were burned without the camp. At the feast of first-fruits a he-goat was offered (Lev 23 19).

(iv) Other special instances were: in the case of defilement, the Nazirite must offer a turtledove or young pigeon on the 8th day after contraction (Nu 6 10 ff); when the days of the separation were fulfilled a ewe-lamb with the other offerings (ver 14) was to be offered; the twelve tribes included in each case a he-goat for sin offering (7 16 ff); at the consecration of the Levites a young bullock (8 8.12). For unwitting sins of the congregation a he-goat was to be offered (15 24.25). If one person erred, a she-goat was permitted (ver 27). A sin offering was required at the feast of the new moon (28 15), at the Passover (ver 22), at Pentecost (ver 30), on the 1st day of the 7th month (29 5), and on the 10th, 15th–22d days (vs 10–38). The ceremony of the red heifer (19 1–10.17) was a special sin offering for purification purposes only. It was of ancient and primitive origin. The young cow was brought without the camp and was slain before the priest's face, blood was sprinkled 7 t before the sanctuary, the entire carcase with cedar wood, hyssop and scarlet was burned, the ashes gathered and laid without the camp in a clean place to be kept for the water of impurity. It was to purify after contact with the dead. In the case of the unknown homicide (Dt 21 1–9) a young unbroken heifer was brought to a running stream, its neck was broken, the elders washed their hands over the heifer in the presence of the priests, declaring their innocence. Thus the bloodshed was expiated. The action was a judicial one, but essentially vicarious and expiatory and had doubtless a primitive origin.

9. The Guilt Offering

The guilt offering (AV "trespass offering") (Lev 5 14—6 7) was a special kind of sin offering, always of a private character and accompanied by a fine. It expressed expiation and restitution. The classes of sin requiring a guilt offering with reparation in money are: (1) a trespass in the holy things done unwittingly; (2) anything which the Law forbade depriving God or the priest of their due; (3) dealing falsely with a neighbor in a deposit, or pledge, or robbery, or oppression; (4) swearing falsely regarding anything lost; (5) seduction of a betrothed bondmaid (Lev 19 20–22). The first two of these are unwitting sins, the others cannot be. The clear statement is made in another place that sins done with a "high hand," i.e. in rebellion against the covenant and its provisions, can have no sacrifice (Nu 15 30). Is this a contradiction, or a later development when it was found that the more stringent law would not work? (See J. M. P. Smith, et al., Atonement, 47 f.) Neither conclusion is probable. These conscious sins are of a kind that will admit of full reparation because against rights of property or in money matters. The sin offering makes atonement toward God, the restitution with the additional one-fifth makes full reparation to man. No such reparation can be made with such sins described as committed with a "high hand." In the case of seduction, rights of property are violated (cf Nu 5 5–8; Dt 22 29).

(1) The ritual (Lev 5 14—6 7).—A ram proportionate in value to the offence and worth at least two shekels is required. The ritual is probably the same as that of the sin offering, though no mention is made of the laying on of hands, and the blood is not brought into the sanctuary, but sprinkled about the base of the altar, the fat and inside parts being burned, and the flesh eaten by the priests in a holy place.

(2) Special statutes.—The leper, when cleansed, on the 8th day must bring a guilt offering of two he-lambs and one ewe-lamb; the priest must wave one he-lamb before Jeh, kill it, and smear blood on the right ear, thumb and toe of the leper. The guilt offering belongs to the priest (Lev 14 12–20). If the leper were too poor for two lambs, one sufficed, with a corresponding meal offering, or one turtledove and a young pigeon (vs 21.22). The Nazirite, if defiled during his period of separation, must bring a he-lamb for a guilt offering (Nu 6 12). All guilt offerings were the priests' and most holy (18 9).

10. Wave Offerings

The wave offerings were parts of the peace offerings, and the custom was seemingly initiated at the consecration of Aaron and his sons (Ex 29 24–27), when the breast and bread were waved before Jeh. Lev 7 30.34 fixes the law. It must be brought from the peace offerings of the offerer himself. At Aaron's consecration Moses put the breast, etc, on Aaron's hands and waved them before Jeh (Lev 8 27). On the 8th day Aaron did the waving (Lev 9 21). The priests were to eat it in a clean place (Lev 10 14 f). The leper's he-lamb was to be waved by the priest, before being offered (Lev 14 12); the lamb of the guilt offering also (14 24). At the feast of first-fruits the sheaf must be waved before Jeh (Lev 23 10.11.15); two loaves also (vs 17.20). Of the Nazirite the priest took the boiled shoulder, a cake and a wafer, put them on the Nazirite's hand and waved them before Jeh (Nu 6 19 f).

11. Heave Offerings

Heave offerings also are parts of the peace offerings, and refer particularly to what is lifted up, or separated unto the service of Jeh. They are first mentioned at the consecration of Aaron (Ex 29 27.28). The offering consisted of the right shoulder or thigh and was the fixed due of the priest (Lev 7 32.34). One cake of the peace offering must be heaved (Lev 7 14). The offering must be eaten in a clean place (Lev 7 14) by the priest's family only (Lev 10 14.15). Of the Nazirite's offering the heave thigh also went to the priest (Nu 6 20). When the Israelites should come into the promised land to eat bread, they must offer a heave offering of the dough, a cake (Nu 15 19.20.21). The law is repeated in Nu 18 8.11.19, and the Levites are to receive a tithe of the heave offerings of the people (ver 24). They were in turn to offer up a tithe of this to the priests (vs 26–32). A portion of the spoil of Midian was a heave offering (31 29.41). Dt commands that all heave offerings be brought to the central sanctuary and eaten there (12 6.11).

12. Drink Offerings or Libations

Jacob poured oil on the stone he had set up (Gen 28 18) in honor of the Deity and consecrated the spot. Jacob later (Gen 35 14) set up a pillar where God had revealed Himself and poured drink offerings and oil upon it. Probably wine was used. Drink offerings accompanied many of the sacrifices (Ex 29 40.41). None could be poured upon the altar of incense (Ex 30 9). At all set feasts the drink offerings must be presented (Lev 23 13.18.37). The Nazirite was not exempt (Nu 6 15.17). Wine and oil must accompany all votive and freewill offerings (15 4.5.7.10.24); the continual burnt offering (28 7.8); sabbaths (vs 9.10) and all the other set feasts (vs 14–31; 29 6–39, passim). That drink offerings were common among the heathen is shown by Dt 32 38.

The cultus is thoroughly in keeping with and adapted to the age, and yet an ideal system in many respects. The ethical side is in the background, the external has the emphasis.

13. Primitive Nature of the Cultus

No sacrifices will avail for a breach of the covenant between God and the people. The people thoroughly believed in the efficacy of the blood. It secured atonement and forgiveness. Their religious life found expression in the sacrifices. God was fed and pleased by the offerings by fire. Many of the customs are ancient and crude, so that it is difficult to imagine how such a primitive system could have been arranged and accepted afterward by the people who had the lofty ethical teachings of the prophets in their hands.

VI. Sacrifices in the History of Israel.—The tribes were outwardly consolidated, and a religious system was provided. Some of it was for the rulers, much for the people and much for the priests alone. The various laws were given in portions and afterward compiled. No one expected them to be observed until the nation had a capital and central sanctuary. Even then not every detail was always possible. They were not observed to any extent in the wilderness (Am 5 25), as it was impracticable. Even circumcision was neglected until the wanderers crossed the Jordan (Josh 5 2). The body of the system was not in full practice for 300 or 400 years. The ritual, as far as it could be observed, served as an educational agency, producing in the minds of the worshippers proper conceptions of the holiness of God, the sinfulness of man, and the proper spirit in approaching God.

1. The Situation at Moses' Death

Lay or common altars were in accordance with Ex 20 24; Dt 16 21; 27 7. In the days of Joshua, the Passover was celebrated (Josh 5 10 f). At Ebal an altar was erected, burnt and peace offerings were presented (Josh 8 30–32). The tabernacle was set up at Shiloh with a horned altar doubtless (Josh 18 1), and the cultus was observed to some extent. Concerning the altar on the east side of the Jordan, see ALTAR.

2. In the Time of Joshua

Canaanitish altars were abundant with their corrupt and licentious cults of the Nature-gods. Israelites with their common altars would naturally use the high places, when possible. The stationary altars of the Canaanites were of course unlawful. The inevitable tendency would be to imitate the worship of the Canaanites. They were rebuked and threatened for this, and, weeping, offered sacrifices at Bochim (Jgs 2 1–5). Gideon rebuilt an altar of Jeh and offered a bullock as a burnt offering (6 25.26). The kid prepared for the angel was not first a sacrifice, but its acceptance as a gift was indicated by its being burned (6 19 f). Jephthah offered up his daughter as a burnt offering, believing such a sacrifice well-pleasing to Jeh (11 31.39). Manoah and his wife prepared a kid for a burnt offering, a meal offering accompanying it (13 16 f). At the time of the civil war with Benjamin the ark and statutory altar seemed to be at Beth-el, where they offered burnt and peace offerings (20 26). The feasts at Shiloh imply at least peace offerings (21 19).

3. In the Period of the Judges

Common lay altars and customary sacrifices were still much in use. The official altar with the statutory individual and national offerings appears to be at Shiloh. Elkanah sacrifices and feasts there yearly (1 S 1 3 f). Such feasts were joyous and tended to excesses, as drunkenness seemed common (1 13 f). All Israel came thither (2 14); the priests claimed their portion, seizing it in an unlawful manner before the fat had been burned, or the flesh had been boiled (2 13–17). This shows that such ritual as was prescribed in Lev was practised and considered by the people the only lawful custom. Was it in writing? Why not? Guilt offerings were made by the Philis when smitten by tumors (6 3.4.8.17). There were five golden mice and five golden tumors. Crude as were their ideas of a guilt offering, their actions show familiarity with the concept. Burnt offerings were used on special occasions and in great crises, such as receiving the ark (6 14 f), going to war (7 9 f; 13 9–12), victory (11 15), etc. Saul met Samuel at a sacrificial feast in a small city (9 12.13) on a high place. At Gilgal there were burnt and peace offerings (10 8; 15 15.21). Saul offered burnt offerings himself (13 9–12), but his fault was not in offering them himself, but in his haste and disobedience toward Samuel. "To obey is better than sacrifice," etc, says Samuel (15 22), recognizing the fundamental principle of the covenant and realizing that ceremonies are in themselves worthless without the right spirit. The same truth is reiterated by the prophets later. To prevent the eating of flesh with the blood Saul built a special altar (14 32–35). Family and clan sacrifices and feasts were evidently common (16 2–5).

4. In the Times of Samuel and Saul

The common altars and those on the high places were still in use. The central sanctuary at Shiloh had been removed, first apparently to Gilgal, then to Nob, and later to Gibeon. David's and Saul's families kept the feast of the new moon, when peace offerings would be sacrificed (1 S 20 5.24–29). The sanctuary at Nob had the shewbread upon the table (21 4 ff) according to Ex 25 30. When the ark was brought up to Jerus, burnt and peace offerings were offered according to the Law (2 S 6 17.18; 1 Ch 16 2.40). Ahithophel offered private sacrifices at Shiloh (2 S 15 12). David offered up burnt, meal and peace offerings when purchasing the threshing-floor of Araunah (1 Ch 21 23–26). The statutory horned altar at this time was at Gibeon (2 Ch 1 6; 1 Ch 21 29), but was soon removed to Jerus (1 Ch 22 1). In the organized sanctuary and ritual, Levites were appointed for attendance on the shewbread, meal offerings, burnt offerings, morning and evening sacrifices, sabbaths, new moons and set feasts (23 28–31), attempting to carry out the Levitical laws as far as possible. At the dedication of the temple Solomon offered burnt, meal and peace offerings in enormous quantities (1 K 8 63; 2 Ch 7 4–7); also burnt and peace offerings with incense triennially (1 K 9 25). The ritual at the regular seasons, daily, sabbaths, new moons, set feasts, etc, was observed according to the Levitical Law (2 Ch 2 4; 8 13). Was it written?

5. In the Days of David and Solomon

The golden calf worship was carried on at Dan and Beth-el, with priests, altars and ritual (1 K 12 27 f). The high places were in use, but very corrupt (13 2 ff). A common altar was in use on Mt. Carmel (18 30.32). Many others were known as Jeh's altars (19 10). The system was in full swing in Amos' time (Am 4 4.5) at Beth-el and Gilgal and probably at Beer-sheba (5 5). Amos bitterly satirizes the hollow, insincere worship, but does not condemn the common altars and sacrifices, as these were legitimate. With Hosea the situation is worse, the cultus has been "canonized," priests have been fed on the sin or sin offerings of the people, and the kingdom soon perished because of its corruption.

6. In the Northern Kingdom

The high places were still in use and not denounced yet by the prophets (1 K 3 2; 2 K 14 4; 15 4.35). Worship was not fully centralized, though tending in that direction. In the days of Abijah

7. In the Southern Kingdom to the Exile

the temple cult was in full operation according to Moses' Law (2 Ch 13 10 f). Asa removed many strange altars and high places because of their corruption (14 3), but not all (15 17; 20 33). In the days of Jehoiada priests and Levites were on duty according to Moses (23 18; 24 14*b;* 2 K 12 4–16). Sin and guilt offerings were in sufficient numbers to be mentioned, but the money went to the priests. Kautzsch (HDB, V) and Paterson (HDB, IV), with others, think these offerings were only fines and altogether different from those of Lev 4, 5. Such a statement is wholly gratuitous. The guilt offerings must be accompanied by fines, but not necessarily the sin offerings. The passage speaks of both as perfectly familiar and of long standing, but details are lacking and there can be no certainty in the matter, except that it proves nothing regarding a ritual of sin and guilt offerings existent or non-existent at that time. Kautzsch's and Paterson's motives are obvious. Having reversed the history and put the ritual law late, they must needs make adjustments in the records to have them agree. In the days of Ahaz, the regular offerings were observed for priests, kings and people (2 K 16 13–15). Hezekiah destroyed many high places (18 4). When repairing the temple, many sin offerings were presented to expiate the terrible sins of the previous reigns and the desecration of the temple (2 Ch 29 21–24); and so, also, burnt offerings (vs 27 f), peace and thank offerings, etc, in large number (vs 31–35; cf Isa 1 10–17). The Passover was celebrated with peace offerings (2 Ch 30 1.2.15.22), oblations and tithes (31 12); courses of Levites were established (31 2), and the king's portion (ver 3). All the common altars were abolished as far as possible, and worship centralized in Jerus (32 12). Reversed by Manasseh (33 3 f), the high places were again used (ver 17). Josiah purged Jerus (34 3), and on the discovery of the Book of the Law, with its rule regarding a central sanctuary, that law was rigidly enforced (35 6–14). The reformation under Josiah did not change the hearts of the people, and the rule followed in spite of all the efforts of Jeremiah and other prophets.

8. In the Exilic and Post-exilic Periods

That the cultus was entirely suspended in Jerus from 586 to 536 BC seems certain. There is no support for G. F. Moore's statement (EB, IV) that an altar was soon rebuilt and sacrificing was carried on with scarcely a break. On the return of the exiles an altar was soon built and the continual burnt offerings began (Ezr 3 2 f), and likewise at the Feast of Tabernacles, new moons and set feasts (vs 4–7). Darius decreed that the Israelites should be given what was needed for the sacrifices (6 9 f). The band under Ezra offered many sin offerings on their return (8 35). At the dedication of the temple many burnt and sin offerings were made for all the tribes (6 17). Those who had married foreign wives offered guilt offerings (10 19). The firman of Artaxerxes provided money for bullocks, rams, lambs, with meal and drink offerings (7 17). Under Nehemiah and after the formal acceptance of the Law, a more complete effort was made to observe it. The shewbread, continual burnt and meal offerings, sabbaths, new moons, set feasts, sin offerings, first-fruits, firstlings, first-fruits of dough, heave offerings of all trees, wine and oil, etc, were carefully attended to (Neh 10 33–37) and were in full force later (13 5.9). There is no hint of innovation, only a thoroughgoing attempt to observe laws that had been somewhat neglected.

9. A Temple and Sacrifices at Elephantine

At the time of Nehemiah and probably two or three centuries previous, there existed a temple on the island of Elephantine in the Nile. It was built by a Jewish military colony, and a system of sacrifices was observed. Just how far they copied the laws of Moses, and what were their ideas of a central sanctuary are uncertain.

10. Human Sacrifices in Israel's History

Several Sem tribes or nations practised human sacrifices. It was common among the Canaanites, as is shown by the excavations at Gezer, Taanach, etc. They seemed to offer children in sacrifice at the laying of cornerstones of houses and other such occasions. Among the Carthaginians, Phoenicians, Greeks and Romans human sacrifices were all too common. The custom was not unknown to the Israelites. Abraham felt called upon to offer up Isaac, but was stopped in the act, and a lesson was given for all time. The abominable practice is forbidden by Moses (Lev 18 21), where it is spoken of as a passing through the fire to Moloch, referring to Moabitish and Ammonitish practices. Anyone practising it was to be stoned (Lev 20 2–5; Dt 12 31; 18 10). The rash vow of Jephthah resulted in the immolation of his daughter, but the incident is recorded as something extraordinary (Jgs 11 31 f). The execution of Zebah and Zalmunna is a case of blood revenge, not sacrifice (8 18 ff). Nor is the slaughter of Agag in any sense a sacrifice (1 S 15 32 f). The death of Saul's sons because of his breach of covenant with the Gibeonites was an expiatory sacrifice, to atone for the father's perfidy (2 S 21 9). The Moabite king in desperation offered up his firstborn and heir to appease the anger of Chemosh, and the effect was startling to the Israelites (2 K 3 27). Ahaz practised the abomination in times of trouble (16 3). Such sacrifices were intended to secure favor with the Deity or appease His wrath. Hiel's firstborn and youngest sons were probably sacrificed at the rebuilding or fortifying of Jericho (1 K 16 34; cf Josh 6 26). Manasseh practised the custom (2 K 21 6), but it was stopped by Josiah (23 10). Micah's words were probably applicable to those times of Ahaz or Manasseh, when they thought to obtain God's favor by costly gifts apart from ethical conditions (Mic 6 6–8). Isaiah refers to a heathen custom practised by Israel of slaying the children in secret places (Isa 57 5), and Jeremiah represents it as practised in his time (Jer 7 31; 19 5). Ezekiel denounces the same practice (Ezk 16 20.21; 23 37).

11. Certain Heathen Sacrifices

Heathen sacrifices are hinted at in the later books, such as swine, a mouse, a horse, a dog (Isa 65 4; 66 3.17; Ezk 8 10; 2 K 23 11). All such animals were unclean to the Hebrews, and the practice had its roots in some form of primitive totemism which survived in those heathen cults. They were little practised among the Israelites. See TOTEMISM.

VII. The Prophets and Sacrifices.—The prophets were reformers, not innovators. Their emphasis was on the ethical, rather than the ritual. They based their teachings on the fundamentals of the covenant, not the incidentals. They accepted sacrifices as part of the religious life, but would give them their right place. They accepted the law regarding common altars, and Samuel, David and Elijah used these altars. They also endorsed the movement toward a central sanctuary, but it is the abuse of the cult that they condemned, rather than its use. They combated the heathenish idea that all God needed was gifts, lavish gifts, and would condone any sin if only they bestowed abundance of gifts. They demanded an inward religion, morality, justice, righteousness, in short, an ethical religion. They preached an ethical God, rather than the profane, debasing and almost blasphemous idea of God which prevailed in their times. They reminded the people of the covenant at Sinai, the foundation principle of which was obedience and loyalty to Jeh. If Joel be early, the cult is in full practice, as he deplores the cutting-off of the meal offering, or minḥāh, and the neṣekh or drink offering, through the devastation of the locusts. He does not mention the burnt offerings, etc, as these would not be cut off by the locusts (Joel 1 7.13; 2 14). Joel emphasized the need for a genuine repentance, telling them to rend their hearts and not their garments (2 13).

Amos condemns the cultus at Beth-el and Gilgal, and sarcastically bids them go on transgressing (4 4.5), mentions burnt, peace, thank and freewill offerings (4 4 f; 5 22), reminds them of the fact that they did not offer sacrifices in the wilderness (5 25), but demands rather righteousness and justice. There is nothing here against the Mosaic origin of the laws.

In Hosea's time the hollow externalism of the cult had become worse, while vice, falsehood, murder, oppression, etc, were rampant. He utters an epoch-making sentence when he says, "I desire mercy, and not sacrifice," etc (6 6). This is no sweeping renunciation of sacrifices, as such; it is only putting the emphasis in the right place. Such sacrifices as Hosea speaks of were worse than worthless. It is somewhat extravagant for Kautzsch to say, "It is perfectly futile to read out of 6 6 anything else than a categorical rejection of sacrifices." Hosea recognizes their place in religion, and deplores the loss during exile (3 4). The corrupt cults he condemns (4 13 f), for they are as bad as the Canaanitish cults (4 9). Jeh will spurn them (8 13; 9 4). The defection of the nation began early (11 2), and they have multiplied altars (12 11; 13 2). He predicts the time when they shall render as bullocks the "calves" of their lips (14 2 AV).

Micah is as emphatic. The sacrifices were more costly in his day, in order the more surely to purchase the favor of the Deity. Human sacrifices were in vogue, but Micah says God requires them "to do justly, and to love kindness, and to walk humbly with thy God" (6 8). This does not in the least affect sacrifices of the right kind and with the right spirit.

Isaiah faces the same situation. There are multitudes of sacrifices, burnt offerings, blood of bullocks and goats, oblations, sweet incense, beasts, etc, but no justice, morality, love, truth or goodness. Thus their sacrifices, etc, are an abomination, though right in themselves (1 11–17; 61 8). The same is true of all pious performances today. It is probable that Isaiah worshipped in the temple (6 1.6). In his eschatological vision there is freedom to offer sacrifices in Egypt (19 19.21). The people are to worship in the holy mountain (27 13). Ariel must let the feasts come around (29 1).

Jeremiah maintains the same attitude. Your "frankincense from Sheba, and the sweet cane," burnt offerings and sacrifices are not pleasing to God (6 20; 14 12). They made the temple a den of robbers, in the streets they baked cakes to the Queen of heaven, etc. He speaks sarcastically, saying, "Add your burnt-offerings unto your sacrifices, and eat ye flesh. For I spake not unto your fathers . . . . concerning . . . . sacrifices: but . . . . commanded . . . . saying, Hearken unto my voice," etc (7 21–23). This was literally true, as we have seen above; the covenant was not based on sacrifices but on obedience. Such a statement does not deny the institution of sacrifices for those within the covenant who are obedient. It is no "subterfuge," as Kautzsch calls it, "to say that the prophets never polemize against sacrifice per se, but only against offerings presented hypocritically, without repentance and a right disposition, with blood-stained hands; against the opera operata of the carnally-minded, half-heathen mass of the people." This is exactly what they do, and they are in perfect harmony with the covenant constitution and with their own ethical and spiritual functions. Kautzsch can make such an extravagant assertion only by ignoring the fact that Jeremiah himself in predicting the future age of righteousness and blessedness makes sacrifice an important factor (33 11.18). Picturing possible prosperity and glory, Jeremiah speaks of burnt and meal offerings, frankincense, thank offerings, etc, being brought into the house of Jeh (17 26). (We are aware of the harsh and arbitrary transference of this passage to a later time.)

Ezekiel is called by Kautzsch "the founder of the Levitical system." He is said to have preserved the fragment of the ritual that was broken up in the exile. But his references to the burnt, sin and trespass offerings presuppose familiarity with them (40 38–42).

He assigns the north and south chambers for the meal, sin and trespass offerings (42 13). The cleansing of the altar requires a bullock and he-goat for a sin offering, with burnt and peace offerings with a ritual similar to Lev 8 1 f (Ezk 43 18–27). The Levites are to be ministers and slay burnt offerings and sacrifice for the people (44 11). The priest must offer his sin offering before he ministers in the sanctuary (44 27). They are to eat the meal, sin, and trespass offerings as in 44 29. In ch 45, the people are to give the wheat, barley, oil and lambs for meal, burnt and peace offerings, while the prince shall give the meal, burnt and drink offerings for the feasts, the new moons, sabbaths and appointed feasts. He is to prepare them to make atonement (45 13–17). In cleansing the sanctuary the Levitical ritual is followed with added details (45 18–20). The Passover requires the burnt, sin and meal offerings with an extra amount of cereal. The priests prepare the prince's burnt and peace offerings (46 2–4.6.9–12) for the sabbaths, new moons, etc. The daily burnt offerings (vs 13–15) must have a sixth instead of a tenth part of an ephah, as in Lev 1. The sin and guilt offerings are to be boiled in a certain place, and the meal offering baked (vs 20.26). Ezk varies from the Levitical Law in the quantity of the meal offering, picturing the ritual in a more ideal situation than Moses. The people are all righteous, with new hearts, the Spirit in them enabling them to keep the Law (36 26 f), and yet he institutes an elaborate ritual of purification for them. Does this seem to indicate that the prophets would abolish sacrifices entirely? It is strange reasoning which makes the prophets denounce the whole sacrificial system, when one of the greatest among them seeks to conserve an elaborate cult for the blessed age in the future.

In the second part of Isa, God declares that He has not been honored by the people with burnt and meal offerings, etc., and that He has not burdened them with such offerings, but that He is wearied with their sins (43 23 f). Those foreigners who respect the covenant shall offer acceptable sacrifices (56 7) in the blessed age to come. The Servant of Jeh is to be a guilt offering (53 10) to expiate the sins of Israel. Sacrifice is here for the first time lifted out of the animal to the human sphere, thus forging the link between the OT and the NT. In the glorious age to come there are to be priests and Levites, new moons, sabbaths and worship in Jerus (66 21.23).

Daniel speaks of the meal offering being caused to cease in the midst of the week (9 27).

Zechariah pictures the golden age to come when all nations shall go up to Jerus to keep the Feast of Tabernacles, which implies sacrifices. Pots are used, and all the worshippers shall use them in the ritual (14 16–21).

In Malachi's age the ritual was in practice, but grossly abused. They offered polluted bread (1 7), blind, lame and sick animals (1 13 f). Jeh has the same attitude toward these as toward those in the times of Amos, Hosea, and Isaiah (Mal 1 10 f). The Gentiles offer better ones (1 11). The Israelites covered the altar of Jeh with tears by their hypocritical, non-ethical actions (2 13). They robbed God in withholding tithes and heave offerings (3 8). It is the abuse of the cult that is denounced here, as in all the other Prophets.

A special use of the term "sacrifice" is made by Zephaniah (1 7 f), applying it to the destruction of Israel by Jeh. Bozrah and Edom are to be victims (Isa 34 6); also Gog and Magog (Ezk 39 17.19).

In summing up the general attitude of the prophets toward sacrifices, even G. F. Moore in EB admits: "It is not probable that the prophets distinctly entertained the idea of a religion without a cultus, a purely spiritual worship. Sacrifice may well have seemed to them the natural expression of homage and gratitude." He might have added, "and of atonement for sin, and full fellowship with God."

VIII. Sacrifice in the "Writings."—Dates are very uncertain here. The Pss and Prov extend from David and Solomon into the Pers period.

1. In the Proverbs

The sages take the same attitude as the prophets. They enjoin the sacrifice of first-fruits (Prov 3 9). A feast usually follows a sacrifice of peace offerings (7 14). The trespass offering (?) has no meaning to fools (14 9), and the sacrifices of the wicked are an abomination to God (15 8; 21 27). Righteousness and justice are more acceptable to Jeh than sacrifices (21 3), yet to them sacrifices are a regular part of worship. Ḳōheleth speaks of sacrifices as quite the custom, and deprecates the offerings of fools (Eccl 5 1; 9 2).

2. In the Psalms

The Psalmist admonishes the faithful to offer the sacrifices of righteousness, i.e. sacrifices offered in the right spirit (4 5). The drink offerings of idolaters are well known (16 4). Prayer is made for the acceptance of sacrifices (20 3). It is a coveted privilege to offer them (27 6; 84 1–4). The true relation between sacrifice and obedience is expressed in 40 6–8. As in Jer 7 21 f, the emphasis is laid on obedience, without which sacrifices are worthless and repugnant to God. They are not the important thing in Israel's religion, for that religion could exist without them as in the wilderness and exile. The teaching corresponds exactly with that of the prophets and is probably late. Ps 50 is even more emphatic. The Psalmist knows that sacrifices are in the covenant regulations (ver 5), but repudiates the idea of giving anything to God or of feeding Him (vs 12.13). Everything belongs to Him, He is not hungry, He would scorn the idea of drinking the blood of goats, etc. The idea of the cultus being of any real value to God is scouted. Yet in the next verse the reader is admonished to offer sacrifices of thanksgiving and pay vows (ver 14). The sacrifices that express worship, penitence, prayer, thanksgiving and faith are acceptable. The penitent Psalmist speaks in similar terms. Sacrifices as such are no delight to God, the real sacrifice is a broken heart (51 16 f). When the heart is right, then, as an expression of true-heartedness, devotion, repentance and faith, burnt offerings are highly acceptable (ver 19). Another Psalmist promises a freewill offering to God (54 6; 66 13. 15). Sacrifices of thanksgiving are advised (96 8; 107 22; 118 27) and promised (116 17). Prayer is likened to the evening sacrifice (141 2).

IX. The Idea and Efficacy of Sacrifices.—That the Hebrews thoroughly believed in the efficacy of sacrifices is without doubt. What ideas they entertained regarding them is not so clear. No single theory can account for all the facts. The unbloody sacrifices were regarded as food for the Deity, or a pleasant odor, in one instance, taking the place of a bloody offering (see above). The bloody offerings present some difficulties, and hence many different views.

1. A Gift of Food to the Deity

Included under the head of gifts of food to the Deity would be the meal and peace offerings, in so far as they were consumed by fire, the burnt offerings and the shewbread, etc. They were fire-food, the fire-distilled essence or etherealized food for God which gave Him pleasure and disposed Him favorably toward the offerer. They were intended either to appease wrath, to win favor, or to express thanks and gratitude for favors experienced. The earlier and more naïve idea was probably to win the favor of the Deity by a gift. Later, other ideas were expressed in the offerings.

2. Expression of Adoration and Devotion

The burnt offering best gave expression to the sentiments of adoration and devotion, though they may not be excluded from the meal and peace offerings. In other words, sacrifice meant worship, which is a complex exercise of the soul. Such was Abraham's attempted sacrifice of Isaac. The daily burnt offerings were intended to represent an unbroken course of adoration and devotion, to keep the right relations with the Deity. On particular occasions, special offerings were made to insure this relation which was specially needed at that time.

3. A Means of Purification from Uncleanness

The burnt and sin offerings were the principal kinds used for the purpose of purification; water being used in case of uncleanness from contact with the dead. There were three classes of uncleanness: (1) those inseparable from the sex functions of men and women; (2) those resulting from contact with a corpse; (3) the case of recovery from leprosy. Purification ceremonies were the condition of such persons enjoying the social and religious life of the community. Why they should require a sin offering when most of them occurred in the regular course of nature and could not be guarded against, can be understood only as we consider that these offences were the effects of sin, or the weaknesses of the fleshly nature, due to sin. Such uncleannesses made the subject unfit for society, and that unfitness was an offence to God and required a piacular offering.

4. A Means of Consecration to the Divine Service

Consecration was of men and things. The ceremonies at the sealing of the covenant and the consecration of the Levites and of Aaron and his sons have been mentioned. The altar and furniture of the tabernacle were consecrated by the blood of the sin offering. This blood being the means of expiation, it cleansed from all defilement caused by human hands, etc. The sprinkling and smearing of the blood consecrated them to the service of God. The blood being holy, it sanctified all it touched (cf Ezk 45 19 f).

5. To Establish a Community of Life between Worshipper and God

In other words, it is a kind of sacral communion. The blood is the sacred cement between man and God. This is possible only because it contains the life and is appropriated by God as a symbol of the communion into which He enters with the offerer. This blood "covers" all sin and defilement in man, permits him to enter God's presence and attests the communion with Him. This is the view of Schultz, and partly that of Kautzsch, in regard to earlier ideas of sacrifice. Such a view may have been held by certain peoples in primitive times, but it does not do justice to the Levitical system.

6. View of Ritschl

The view of Ritschl is that sacrifices served as a form of self-protection from God whose presence meant destruction to a weak creature. Thus sacrifices have no moral value and no relation to sin and deflement. They have relation only to man's creaturely weakness which is in danger of destruction as it approaches the presence of God. God's presence necessarily meant death to the creature without reference to his holiness, etc. Such a view banishes all real sense of sin, all ethical values, and furnishes no proper motives. It gives a false idea of the character of God, and is entirely out of accord with the sacred record.

7. Sacrifice a Sacrament

That sacrifices were really a sacrament has been advocated by many. According to some theologians, the sacrifices were signs of spiritual realities, not only representing but sealing and applying spiritual blessings, and their efficacy was proportionate to the faith of the offerer. By some Roman Catholic theologians it is held that the Passover was esp. of a sacramental character, corresponding to the Eucharist. The purificatory rites corresponded to penance and the consecrating sacrifices to the sacrament of ordination. Bähr says that the acceptance of the sacrifice by Jeh and His gift of sanctification to the worshippers give to the sacrifice the character of a sacramental act. Cave also speaks of them as having a sacramental significance, while refuting the position of Bähr. Though there may be a slight element of truth in some of these ideas, it is not the idea expressed in the cultus, and seems to read into the ritual the theology of the theologians themselves. This view is closely allied to a phase of the following view (see Paterson, HDB, IV).

8. A Symbol or Expression of Prayer

That it is a symbol or expression of prayer is held by Maurice and to some extent by Schultz. Thus the sacrifices are supposed to be symbols of the religious sentiment, which are the conditions of acceptance with God. The victim serves as an index of what is in the worshipper's heart, and its virtue is exhausted when it is presented to God. Thus it may express spiritual aspiration or supplication, hatred of sin and surrender to God with confession and supplication. Bähr holds that a valuable and unblemished victim is selected as symbolical of the excellence and purity to which the offerer aspires, the death is necessary to procure life which may be offered to God, and the sprinkling of the blood is the presentation to God of the life still resident in the blood. Schultz thinks that the sin offering was distinctively purifying. "Hence the real ground of purification is that God accepts the sacrifice and thereby enters into communion with the sinner, granting him actual pardon, and that man in this offering enjoined by God as the embodied prayer of a penitent expresses his confession, his regrets and his petition for forgiveness." While there is an element of truth in this, and it is particularly applicable to the burnt offering, it does not embrace all the facts. It represents the views of the prophets and psalmists more than that of the Levitical code.

9. View of Kautzsch

Kautzsch holds that the efficacy of sacrifices consists in this: "God has connected the accomplishment of atonement with the obedient discharge of the sacrificial prescriptions; whoever fulfils these and gets the priest to perform the atoning usages, is forgiven. The ritual, esp. the presenting of the blood, is the indispensable condition of atonement, but it is not synonymous. Forgiveness of sin flows from the grace of God as taught by the prophets, only with them it is unnecessary, but with the PC it is necessary." Thus Kautzsch teaches a fundamental contradiction between the prophets and the Law, which is utterly wrong and is made necessary by first turning the history upside down and making the PC a hideous anachronism. He says, "That the process of atonement is connected with the presenting of blood, explains itself naturally as a powerful after-influence of primitive sacrificial usages, in which the presenting of blood had a different meaning. It is a symbolic (not real) satisfaction, as through the animal's life symbolic expression is given to the fact that the sinner's life is forfeited to God. But the main idea is that God has commanded it" (HDB, V, 721*a*). The half-truths in these statements will be obvious to most readers.

10. Vicarious Expiation Theory

The theory that sacrifices were a vicarious expiation of sin and defilement, by a victim whose life is forfeited instead of the sinner's, is the only one that will complete the Levitical idea of sacrifices. This of course applies esp. to the sin offering. While there is an element of truth in the gift-theory, the prayer and sacramental theories and others, including that of Kautzsch, the idea of a vicarious suffering is necessary to complete the conception. Oehler recognizes the force of the prayer-theory, but advances to the idea that in sacrifices man places the life of a pure, innocent, sacrificial animal between himself and God, because he is unable to approach God on account of his sinfulness and impurity. Thus it becomes a kōpher for him, to cover his sin. This is not a punishment inflicted on the animal, although in the case of uncertain homicide it is (Dt 21 1–9). The law does not lay the emphasis upon the slaughter, but on the shedding of the blood and the sprinkling of it on certain articles. The slaughter is of course presupposed. The altar is not regarded as a place of execution, it is the means for "covering" the sins of the covenant people, a gracious ordinance of God and well-pleasing to Him. But the gift can please God only as the gift of one who has given himself up to Him; therefore the ritual must represent this self-surrender, the life of the clean and guiltless animal in place of the impure and sinful soul of the offerer, and this pure soul, coming in between the offerer and the Holy God, lets Him see at the altar a pure life by which the impure life is covered. In the same way the pure element serves to cover the pollutions of the sanctuary and the altar, etc. Its meaning is specific, it is the self-sacrifice of the offerer vicariously accomplished. This self-sacrifice necessarily involves suffering and punishment, which is inflicted on the beast to which the guilt and sin are imputed, not imparted (see Oehler, OT Theol., 278 f).

Objections have been raised by Dillmann, Kautzsch and others on the ground that it could not have been vicarious because sacrifices were not allowed for sins which merited death, but only for venial transgressions (Nu 15 30). Certainly, but the entire sacrificial system was for those who were in the covenant, who did not commit sins that merited death, and was never intended as a penal substitute, because the sins of those in the covenant were not of a penal nature. The sacrifices were "to cover" the sin and defilement of the offerer, not the deserved death-penalty of one who broke the covenant. Again, they object, a cereal offering may atone, and this excludes a penal substitute. But sacrifices were not strictly penal, and the cereal was distinctly an exception in case of the very poor, and the exception proves the rule. In any case it represented the self-sacrifice of the offerer, and that was the important thing. Further, the victim was slain by the offerer and not by the priest, whereas it should have been put to death by God's representative. This carries no weight whatever, as the essential thing was a sacrifice, and priests were not necessary for that. A more serious objection is that in the case of penal substitution, by which the sin and guilt are transferred to the animal, the flesh of that animal is regarded as most holy and to be eaten by the priests only, whereas it would necessarily be regarded as laden with guilt and curse, and hence polluted and unfit for use. This is a pure assumption. In the first place, the substitution was not strictly penal, and, secondly, there is no hint that actual pollution is conveyed to the flesh of the animal or to the blood. Even if it were so, the shedding of the blood would expiate the sin and guilt, wipe out the pollution, and the flesh would be in no way affected. On the contrary, the flesh, having been the vehicle for the blood which has accomplished such a sacred and meritorious service, would necessarily be regarded as most holy. All the animal would be holy, rather than polluted, since it had performed such a holy service. Kautzsch's objection thus appears puerile. The ritual of the Day of Atonement presents all these features. It is distinctly stated that the high priest confesses the iniquities of the children of Israel over the scapegoat, and that the goat carries this guilt away to the desert. Its blood is not shed, it is wholly unclean, and the man leading it away is unclean. This is undeniably a vicarious act. In the case of the other goat, a sin offering, the sin and guilt are imputed to it, but the life is taken and thus the expiation is made and the flesh of the victim used in such a holy service is most holy.

That this view of a vicarious expiation was generally accepted is evident on every hand. There was no need of a theoretical explanation in the cultus; it was self-evident; as Holtzmann says, "the most external indeed, but also the simplest and most generally intelligible and the readiest answer to the nature of expiation" (NT Theol., I, 68). This view is amply corroborated by the researches of S. I. Curtiss in his Primitive Sem Religion of Today. By searching questions he found that the fundamental idea of bloody sacrifices was that the victim took the place of the man, redeemed him, or atoned for him as a substitute. The "bursting forth of the blood" was the essential thing (see pp. 218 f).

11. Typology of Sacrifice

The typology of sacrifice has been much discussed. There can be no question that, from the standpoint of the NT, many of the sacrifices were typical. They prefigured, and designedly so, the great sacrifice of Christ. Thus they could not really take away sin; they were in that sense unreal. But the question is, were they typical to the people of Israel? Did Moses and the priests and prophets and people understand that they were merely figures, adumbrations of the true Sacrifice to come, which alone could take away sin? Did they understand that their Messiah was to be sacrificed, His blood shed, to make an atonement for them, and render their Divinely given means of atonement all unreal? The answer must be an emphatic "No." There is no hint that their minds were directed to think of the Coming One as their sacrifice, foreshadowed by their offerings. That was the one thing the nation could not and would not understand, and to this day the cross is their chief stumbling-block. The statement that the Servant is to be a guilt offering (Isa 53 10) is the nearest approach to it, but this is far from saying that the whole sacrificial system was understood as foreshadowing that event. The great prophets all speak of a sacrificial system in full vogue in the Messianic age.

We prefer to regard the sacrificial system as a great religious educational system, adapted to the capacity of the people at that age, intended to develop right conceptions of sin, proper appreciation of the holiness of God, correct ideas of how to approach God, a familiarity with the idea of sacrifice as the fundamental thing in redemption, life, and service to God and man.

I. Terms of Sacrifice Epitomized.—The word "offering" (προσφορά, prosphorá) describes the death of Christ, once in Paul (Eph 5 2); 5 t in He (10 5.8.10.14.18). The vb. προσφέρω, prosphérō, "to offer," is also used, 15 t in He (5 1.3; 8 3^2.3.4; 9 7.14.25.28; 10 1.8.11.12; 11 4). The noun prosphora occurs 15 t in LXX, usually as the tr of מִנְחָה, minḥāh, "sacrifice." This noun in the NT refers to OT sacrifices in Acts 7 42; 21 26; to the offering of money in Acts 24 17; Rom 15 16. The vb. ἀναφέρω, anaphérō, also occurs 3 t in He (7 27; 9 28; 13 15); also in 1 Pet 2 5.

The word "sacrifice" (θυσία, thusía, translates in LXX 8 Heb words for various kinds of sacrifice, occurring about 350 t) refers to Christ's death, once in Paul (Eph 5 2) and 5 t in He (5 1; 9 23.26; 10 12.26). It refers several times to OT sacrifice and 5 t to Christian living or giving (Phil 2 17; 4 18; He 13 15.16; 1 Pet 2 5). The vb. "to sacrifice" (θύω, thúō) is used once by Paul to describe Christ's death (1 Cor 5 7).

The blood (αἷμα, haíma) of Christ is said to secure redemption or salvation, 6 t in Paul (Rom 3 25; 5 9; 1 Cor 10 16; Eph 1 7; 2 13; Col 1 20); 3 t in He (9 12.14; 10 19; cf also 10 29); 2 t in 1 Pet (1 2.19) and 5 t in the Johannine writings (1 Jn 1 7; 5 6^2.8; Rev 1 5). Unmistakably this figure of the blood refers to Christ's sacrificial death. "In any case the phrase ἐν τῷ αὐτοῦ αἵματι [en tṓ autoú haímati, 'in his blood,' Rom 3 25] carries with it the idea of sacrificial bloodshedding" (Sanday, Comm. on Ep. to Rom, 91).

Λύτρον (lútron, "ransom," the price paid for redeeming, occurring in LXX 19 t, meaning the price paid for redeeming the servant [Lev 25 51.52]; ransom for first-born [Nu 3 46]; ransom for the life of the owner of the goring ox [Ex 21 30, etc]) occurs in the NT only twice (Mt 20 28; Mk 10 45). This word is used by Jesus to signify the culmination of His sacrificial life in His sacrificial death.

Ἀντίλυτρον (antílutron, "ransom," a word not found in LXX, stronger in meaning than the preceding word) occurs only once in the NT (1 Tim 2 6).

Ἀπολύτρωσις (apolútrōsis, "redemption," in Ex 21 8, meaning the ransom paid by a father to redeem his daughter from a cruel master) signifies (1) deliverance from sin by Christ's death, 5 t in Paul (Rom 3 24; 1 Cor 1 30; Eph 1 7.14; Col 1 14); once in He (9 15); (2) general deliverance, twice (Lk 21 28; He 11 35); (3) the Christian's final deliverance, physical and spiritual (Rom 8 23; Eph 4 30). The simple word λύτρωσις (lútrōsis, "redemption," 10 t in LXX as the tr of 5 Heb words) occurs once for spiritual deliverance (He 9 12).

Ἐξαγοράζω (exagorázō, "redeem," only once in LXX, Dnl 2 8) in the NT means (1) to deliver from the curse of the law, twice by Paul (Gal 3 13; 4 5); (2) to use time wisely, twice by Paul (Eph 5 16; Col 4 5). The simple vb. ἀγοράζω (agorázō, meaning in Lev 27 19 to redeem land) occurs twice in Paul (1 Cor 6 20; 7 23) and means "to redeem" (in a spiritual sense).

Καταλλαγή (katallagḗ, "reconciliation," only twice in LXX) means the relation to God into which men are brought by Christ's death, 4 t by Paul (Rom 5 11; 11 15; 2 Cor 5 18.19).

Καταλλάσσειν (katallássein, "to reconcile," 4 t in LXX [3 in 2 Macc]) means to bring men into the state of reconciliation with God, 5 t in Paul (Rom 5 10 bis; 2 Cor 5 18.19.20).

The words with the propitiatory idea occur as follows: ἱλάσκομαι (hiláskomai, "to propitiate," 12 t in LXX, tr^d "to forgive") occurs twice (Lk 18 13; He 2 17); ἱλασμός (hilasmós, 9 t in LXX, Nu 5 8; Ps 129 [130] 4, etc; "atonement," "forgiveness") occurs twice in 1 Jn (2 2; 4 10); ἱλαστήριον (hilastḗrion, 24 t in LXX, translates "mercy-seat," where God was gracious and spake to man) translates in the NT "propitiation" (Rom 3 25), "mercy-seat" (He 9 5).

Christ is called "the Lamb," ἀμνός, amnós, twice by the Baptist (Jn 1 29.36); once by Philip applied to Christ from Isa 53 7 (Acts 8 32); and once by Peter (1 Pet 1 19); ἀρνίον, arníon, 28 t in Rev (5 6.8.12.13; 6 1.16; 7 9.10.14; 19 7.9; 21 9.14.22.23.27; 22 1.3).

The cross (σταυρός, staurós) is used by Paul 10 t to describe the sacrificial death of Christ (1 Cor 1 17.18; Gal 5 11; 6 12.14; Eph 2 16; Phil 2 8; 3 18; 1 Cor 1 20; 2 14) and once by the author of He (12 2). Jesus also 5 t used the figure of the cross to define the life of sacrifice demanded of His disciples and to make His own cross the symbol of sacrifice (Mt 10 38; 16 24; Mk 8 34; Lk 9 23; 14 27, with contexts; cf Jn 3 14; 12 32, etc).

Though it is not our province in this article to discuss the origin and history of sacrifice in the ethnic religions, it must be noted that sacrifice has been a chief element in almost every religion (Jainism and Buddhism being the principal exceptions). The bloody sacrifice, where the idea of propitiation is prominent, is well-nigh universal in the ethnic religions, being found among even the most enlightened peoples like the Greeks and Romans (see art. "Expiation and Atonement" in ERE). Whether or not the system of animal sacrifices would have ceased, not only in Judaism but also in all the ethnic religions, had not Jesus lived and taught and died, is a question of pure speculation. It must be conceded that the sect of the Jews (Essenes) attaining to the highest ethical standard and living the most unselfish lives of brotherhood and benevolence did not believe in animal sacrifices. But they exerted small influence over the Jewish nation as compared with the Pharisees. It is also to be noted that the prophets Amos, Hosea, Micah and Isaiah exalted the ethical far above the ceremonial; even denounced the sacrifice of animals if not accompanied by personal devotion to righteousness (Am 5 21 ff; Hos 6 6; Mic 6 6 ff; Isa 1 11 ff). The Stoic and Platonic philosophers also attacked the system of animal sacrifices. But these exceptions only accentuate the historical fact that man's sense of the necessity of sacrifice to Deity is well-nigh universal. Only the sacrifice of Christ and the destruction of Jerus caused a cessation of the daily, weekly, monthly and annual sacrifices among the Jews, and only the knowledge of Christ's sacrifice of Himself will finally destroy the last vestige of animal sacrifice.

II. Attitude of Jesus and NT Writers to the OT Sacrificial System.—Jesus never attacks the sacrificial system. He even takes for granted that the Jews should offer sacrifices (Mt 5 24). More than that, He accepted the whole sacrificial system, a part of the OT scheme, as of Divine origin, and so He commanded the cleansed leper to offer the sacrifice prescribed in the Mosaic code (Mt 8 4). There is no record that Jesus Himself ever worshipped by offering the regular sacrifices. But He worshipped in the temple, never attacking the sacrificial system as He did the oral law (Mk 7 6 ff). On the other hand, Jesus undermined the sacrificial system by teaching that the ethical transcends the ceremonial, not only as a general principle, but also in the act of worship (Mt 5 23.24). He endorses Hosea's fine ethical epigram, 'God will have mercy and not sacrifice' (Mt 9 13; 12 7). He also commends as near the kingdom the scribe who put love to God and man above sacrifice (Mk 12 33). But Jesus teaches not merely the inferiority of sacrifice to the moral law, but also the discontinuance of sacrifice as a system, when He said, "This is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many" (Mk 14 24; Mt 26 28; Lk 22 20). Not only is the ethical superior to the ceremonial, but His sacrifice of Himself is as superior to the sacrifices of the old system as the new covenant is superior to the old.

1. Jesus' Attitude

Paul's estimate of the Jewish sacrifices is easily seen, although he does not often refer to them. Once only (Acts 21 26) after his conversion does he offer the Jewish sacrifice, and then as a matter of expediency for winning the Judaistic wing of Christianity to his universal gospel of grace. He regarded the sacrifices of the OT as types of the true sacrifice which Christ made (1 Cor 5 7).

2. Paul's Attitude

The author of the Ep. to the He discusses the OT sacrifices more fully than other NT writers. He regards the bloody sacrifices as superior to the unbloody and the yearly sacrifice on the Day of Atonement by the high priest as the climax of the OT system. The high priest under the old covenant was the type of Christ under the new. The sacrifices of the old covenant could not take away sin, or produce moral transformation, because of the frailties of men (10 1–11), shown by the necessity of repeating the offerings (5 2), and because God had appointed another high priest, His Son, to supplant those of the old covenant (5 5; 7 1–28). The heart of this author's teaching is that animal sacrifices cannot possibly atone for sin or produce moral transformation, since they are Divinely appointed only as a type or shadow of the one great sacrifice by Christ (8 7; 10 1).

3. Attitude of the Author of Hebrews

To sum up, the NT writers, as well as Jesus, regarded the OT sacrificial system as of Divine origin and so obligatory in its day, but imperfect and only a type of Christ's sacrifice, and so to be supplanted by His perfect sacrifice.

III. The Sacrificial Idea in the NT.—The one central idea of NT writers is that the sacrifice made by Christ on the cross is the final perfect sacrifice for the atonement of sin and the salvation of men, a sacrifice typified in the various sacrifices of the OT, which are in turn abrogated by the operation of the final sacrifice. Only James and Jude among NT writers are silent as to the sacrifice of Christ, and they write for practical purposes only.

1. Teaching of John the Baptist

The Baptist, it is true, presents Jesus as the coming Judge in the Synoptic Gospels, but in Jn 1 29.36 he refers to Him as "the Lamb of God," in the former passage adding "that taketh away the sin of the world." Westcott (Comm. on St. John, 20) says: "The title as applied to Christ . . . . conveys the ideas of vicarious suffering, of patient submission, of sacrifice, of redemption, etc." There is scarcely any doubt that the Baptist looked upon the Christ as the one who came to make the great sacrifice for man's sins. Professor Burton (Bib. Ideas of Atonement, Burton, Smith and Smith, 107) says that John sees Christ "suffering under the load of human sin."

2. Teaching of Jesus

There are recorded in the Synoptic Gospels two unmistakable references by Jesus to His death as a sacrifice (Mk 10 45 ‖ Mt 20 28; Mk 14 24 ‖ Mt 26 28 ‖ Lk 22 20; cf 1 Cor 11 25). In the former He declares He came to give His "life a ransom." Thayer (Gr-Eng. Lex. of the NT) says this word means "the price paid for redeeming." Hence the idea in ransom must be of sacrificial significance. But if there could be any doubt as to the sacrificial import of this passage, there is a clear case of the sacrificial idea in Mk 14 24. Practically all writers of the NT theology, Wendt, Weiss, Stevens, Sheldon and others, hold that Jesus considered the death as the ratification sacrifice of the new covenant, just as the sacrifice offered at Sinai ratified the old covenant (Ex 24 3–8). Ritschl and Beyschlag deny that this passage is sacrificial. But according to most exegetes, Jesus in this reference regarded His death as a sacrifice. The nature of the sacrifice, as Jesus estimated it, is in doubt and is to be discussed later. What we are pressing here is the fact that Jesus regarded His death as a sacrifice. We have to concede the meagerness of material on the sacrificial idea of His death as taught by Jesus. Yet these two references are unquestioned by literary and historical critics. They both occur in Mk, the primitive Gospel (the oldest Gospel record of Jesus' teachings). The first occurs in two of the Synoptists, the second in all three of them. Luke omits the first for reasons peculiar to his purpose. According to Lk 24 25, Jesus regarded His sufferings and death as the fulfilment of the OT Scriptures.

3. Teaching of Peter

Though the head apostle does not in the early chapters of Acts refer to Christ as the sacrifice for sin, he does imply as much in 2 36 (He is Lord and Christ in spite of His crucifixion); 3 18.19 (He fulfilled the prophecies by suffering, and by means of repentance sins are to be blotted out); 4 10–12 (only in His name is salvation) and in 5 30.31 (through whose death Israel received remission of sins). In his First Ep. (1 18.19) he expressly declares that we are redeemed by the blood of the spotless Christ, thus giving the sacrificial significance to His death. The same is implied in 1 2; 3 18.

4. Paul's Teaching

Paul ascribes saving efficacy to the blood of Christ in Rom 3 25; 5 9; 1 Cor 10 16; Eph 1 7; 2 13; Col 1 20. He identifies Christ with a sin offering in Rom 8 3, and perhaps also in 2 Cor 5 21, and with the paschal lamb in 1 Cor 5 7. In other passages he implies that the death of Christ secured redemption, forgiveness of sins, justification and adoption (Rom 3 24–26; 5 10.11; 8 15.17, etc).

5. Teaching of Hebrews

The argument of the author of He to prove the finality of Christianity is that Christ is superior to the Aaronic high priest, being a royal, eternal high priest, after the order of Melchizedek, and offering Himself as the final sacrifice for sin, and for the moral transformation of men (4 14; 10 18).

6. Johannine Teaching

In the First Ep. of Jn (1 7; 2 2; 5 6.8) propitiation for sin and cleansing from sin are ascribed to the blood of Christ. In Rev 1 5 John ascribes deliverance (not washing or cleansing, according to best MSS) from sin, to the blood of Christ. Several times he calls Christ the Lamb, making the sacrificial idea prominent. Once he speaks of Him as the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world (13 8).

To sum up, all the NT writers, except James and Jude, refer to Christ's death as the great sacrifice for sin. Jesus Himself regarded His death as such. In the various types of NT teaching Christ's death is presented (1) as the covenant sacrifice (Mk 14 24 ‖ Mt 26 28 ‖ Lk 22 20; He 9 15–22); (2) as the sin offering (Rom 8 3; 2 Cor 5 21; He 13 11; 1 Pet 3 18); (3) as the offering of the paschal lamb (1 Cor 5 7); (4) as the sacrifice of the Day of Atonement (He 2 17; 9 12 ff).

IV. Relation of Christ's Sacrifice to Man's Salvation.—The saving benefits specified in the NT as resulting from the sacrificial death of Christ are as follows:

1. Redemption or Deliverance from Curse of Sin

Redemption or deliverance from the curse of sin: This must be the implication in Jesus' words, "The Son of man also came . . . . to give his life a ransom for many" (Mk 10 45 ‖ Mt 20 28). Man is a captive in sin, the Father sends His Son to pay the ransom price for the deliverance of the captive, and the Son's death is the price paid. Paul also uses the words "redeemed" and "redemption" in the same sense. In the great letters he asserts that we are "justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus: whom God set forth to be a propitiation . . . . in his blood" (Rom 3 24.25). Here the apostle traces justification back to redemption as the means for securing it, and redemption back to the "blood" (Christ's death) as the cause of its procurement. That is, Christ's death secures redemption and redemption procures justification. In Gal (3 13), he speaks of being redeemed "from the curse of the law." The law involved man in a curse because he could not keep it. This curse is the penalty of the broken law which the transgressor must bear, unless deliverance from said penalty is somehow secured. Paul represents Christ by His death as securing for sinners deliverance from this curse of the broken law (cf Gal 4 5 for the same thought, though the word "curse" is not used). Paul also emphasizes the same teaching in the Captivity Epp.: "In whom we have our redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of our trespasses" (Eph 1 7; cf Col 1 14). In the pastoral letters (1 Tim 2 6) he teaches that Christ gave "himself a ransom for all." This is the only NT passage in which occurs the strong word antilutron for "ransom." In his old age the apostle feels more positively than ever before that Christ's death is the ransom price of man's deliverance from sin.

The author of He asserts that Christ by the sacrifice of Himself "obtained eternal redemption" for man (9 12). John says that Christ "loosed [λύω, lúō] us from our sins by his blood" (Rev 1 5). This idea in John is akin to that of redemption or deliverance by ransom. Peter teaches the same truth in 1 Pet 1 19. So, we see, Jesus and all the NT writers regard Christ's sacrifice as the procuring cause of human redemption.

2. Reconciliation

The idea of reconciliation involves a personal difference between two parties. There is estrangement between God and man. Reconciliation is the restoration of favor between the two parties. Jesus does not utter any direct message on reconciliation, but implies God's repugnance at man's sin and strained relations between God and the unrepentant sinner (see Lk 18 13). He puts into the mouth of the praying tax-gatherer the words, 'God be propitious to me' (see Thayer, Gr-Eng. Lex., hilaskomai), but Jesus nowhere asserts that His death secures the reconciliation of God to the sinner. Paul, however, does. "For if, while we were enemies, we were reconciled to God through the death of his Son," etc (Rom 5 10). There can be no doubt from this passage that Paul thought of the death of Christ as the procuring cause of reconciliation. In Eph 2 13.14.18 Paul makes the cross of Christ the means of reconciliation between the hostile races of men. Paul reaches the climax in his conception of the reconciliation wrought by the cross of Christ when he asserts the unifying results of Christ's death to be cosmic in extent (Eph 1 10).

The author of He also implies that Christ's death secures reconciliation when he regards this death as the ratification of the "better covenant" (8 6 ff), and when he plays on the double meaning of the word διαθήκη (diathḗkē, 9 15 ff), now "covenant" and now "will," "testament." The death of Christ is necessary to secure the ratification of the new covenant which brings God and man into new relations (8 12). In 2 17 the author uses a word implying propitiation as wrought by the death of Christ. So the doctrine of reconciliation is also in the Ep. to the He. John teaches reconciliation with God through Christ our Advocate, but does not expressly connect it with His death as the procuring cause (1 Jn 2 1.2). Peter is likewise silent on this point.

3. Remission of Sins

Reconciliation implies that God can forgive; yea, has forgiven. Jesus and the NT writers declare the death of Christ to be the basis of God's forgiveness. Jesus in instituting the memorial supper said, "This is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many unto remission of sins" (Mt 26 28). It is true Mk and Lk do not record this last phrase, "unto remission of sins." But there is no intimation that this phrase is the result of Matthew's theologizing on the purpose of Christ's death (see Wendt, Teaching of Jesus, II, 239 ff, who claims this phrase is not from Jesus; also Allen in "Mt," ICC, in loc.). But Paul leaves no doubt as to the connection between man's forgiveness by God and Christ's sacrifice for him. This idea is rooted in the great passage on justification (Rom 3 21—5 21; see esp. 4 7); is positively declared in Eph 1 7; Col 1 14. The author of He teaches that the shedding of Christ's blood under the new covenant is as necessary to secure forgiveness as the shedding of animal's blood under the old. John also implies that forgiveness is based on the blood (1 Jn 1 7–9).

True reconciliation and forgiveness include the canceling of the offender's guilt. Jesus has no direct word on the cancellation of guilt. Paul closes his argument for the universality of human sin by asserting that "all the world may be brought under the judgment of God" (AV "guilty before God," Rom 3 19). Thayer (Gr-Eng. Lex., in loc.) says this word "guilty" means "owing satisfaction to God" (liable to punishment by God). But in Rom 8 1.3 Paul exclaims, "There is therefore now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus . . . . God, sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh and for sin" (ERV and ARVm "as an offering for sin"). The guilt, or exposure of the sinner to God's wrath and so to punishment, is removed by the sin offering which Christ made. This idea is implied by the author of He (2 15), but is not expressed in Peter and John.

4. The Cancellation of Guilt

5. Justification or Right Standing with God

Right standing with God is also implied in the preceding idea. Forgiving sin and canceling guilt are the negative, bringing into right standing with God the positive, aspects of the same transaction. "Him who knew no sin he made to be sin [i.e. the sin offering; so Augustine and other Fathers, Ewald, Ritschl; see Meyer, Comm., in loc., who denies this meaning] on our behalf; that we might become the righteousness of God in him" (2 Cor 5 21). In this passage Paul makes justification the Divine purpose of the sacrificial death of Christ. This thought is elaborated by the apostle in Gal and Rom, but is not expressed by Jesus, or in He, in Pet or in Jn.

6. Cleansing or Sanctification

Jesus does not connect our cleansing or sanctification with His death, but with His word (Jn 17 17). The subst. "cleansing" (καθαρισμός, katharismós) is not used by Paul, and the vb. "to cleanse" (καθαρίζω, katharízō) occurs only twice in his later letters (Eph 5 26; Tit 2 14). He does use the idea of sanctification, and in Rom 6–8 teaches that sanctification is a logical consequence of justification which is secured by Christ's sacrificial death. In Phil 3 10.11, he views Christ's death and resurrection as the dynamic of transformation in the new life. The author of He (1 3; 9 14.22.23; 10 2), following his OT figures, uses the idea of cleansing for the whole process of putting away sin, from atonement to sanctification (see Westcott, Comm., in loc.). He makes Christ's death the procuring cause of the cleansing. John does the same (1 Jn 1 7; Rev 7 14).

7. Sonship

Divine sonship of the believer is also traced by Paul to the sacrificial death of Christ (Rom 8 17), though this thought is not found in other NT writers.

So, we sum up, the whole process of salvation, from reconciliation with God to the adoption of the saved sinner into heaven's household, is ascribed, to some extent by Jesus, largely by Paul the theologian of the NT, and, in varying degrees, by other NT writers, to the sacrificial death of Christ. Even Holtzmann (Neutest. Theol., II, 111) admits "It is upon the moment of death that the grounding of salvation is exclusively concentrated."

V. How Christ's Sacrifice Procures Salvation.—It must be conceded that the NT writers, much less Jesus, did not discuss this subject from the philosophical point of view. Jesus never philosophizes except incidentally. Paul, the author of He, and John had a philosophy underlying their theology, the first and second dealing most with the sacrificial work of Christ, the last with His person. But Paul and the author of He did not write their letters to produce a philosophical system explaining how Christ's sacrificial death can and does procure man's salvation.

1. Jesus' Teaching

By some it is claimed that the word "ransom" (Mk 10 45) gives us the key to the philosophy of the atonement as presented by Jesus Himself. But the rules of exegesis are against this supposition. Jesus in the context is teaching His disciples that sacrificial service is greatness. To illustrate the truth He refers to His own example of coming to "minister, and to give his life a ransom for many." That is, Jesus is enforcing a practical principle and not elaborating a theoretical truth. Moreover, the word "ransom" is used metaphorically, and the laws of exegesis forbid us to press the literal meaning of a figure. The figure suggests captivity in sin and deliverance by payment of a price (the death of Christ). But Jesus does not tell us how His sacrificial death can and does pay the price for man's redemption from sin. The word "ransom" does give the clue to the development of the vicarious sacrifice elaborated later by Paul. Ritschl (Rechtfertigung und Versöhnung, II, 85) does not do the word "ransom" justice when he claims that it merely reproduces the meaning of the Heb כֹּפֶר, kōpher, "covering as a protection," and that Christ's death, like a covering, delivers us by stimulating us to lead the life of sacrificial service as Christ did. Wendt (Lehre Jesu, II, 237; Teaching of Jesus, II, 226 f) admits the "ransom"-idea in the word, but says Christ delivers us from bondage to suffering and death, not by His death, but by His teaching which is illustrated by His sacrificial death. Beyschlag (Neutest. Theol., I, 153) thinks Christ's death delivers us from worldly ambitions and such sins by showing us the example of Jesus in sacrifice. Weiss (Bib. Theol. of the NT, I, 101–3) thinks Christ's "surrender of His life . . . . avails as a ransom which He gives instead of the many" who were not able to pay the price themselves. He also adds, "The saying regarding the ransom lays emphasis upon the God-pleasing performance of Jesus which secures the salvation," etc.

Nor does Jesus' saying at the Last Supper, "This is my blood of the covenant" (Mk 14 24) give us unmistakable evidence of how His death saves men. It does teach that sinners on entering the kingdom come into a new covenant relation with God which implies forgiveness of sin and fellowship with God, and that, as the covenant sacrifices at Mt. Sinai (Ex 24 3–8) ratified the legal covenant between God and His people, so the death of Christ as a covenant sacrifice ratifies the covenant of grace between God and lost sinners, by virtue of which covenant God on His part forgives the penitent sinner, and the surrendering sinner on his part presents himself to God for the life of sacrifice. But this statement fails to tell us how God can forgive sin on the basis of a covenant thus ratified by Christ's death. Does it mean substitution, that as the animal whose blood ratified the covenant was slain instead of the people, so Christ was slain in the place of sinners? Or does it suggest the immutability of the covenant on the basis of the animal's (and so Christ's) representing both God and man, and killing signifying loss of life or will to change the covenant (so Westcott, Comm. on He, 301)? It could scarcely mean that Christ's sacrifice was the offering of a perfect, acceptable life to God (Wendt, op. cit., II, 237), or that Christ's death is viewed merely as the common meal sacrifice, that God and His people thus enter into a kind of union and communion (so some evolutionists in the study of comparative religion; see Menzies, Hist of Religion, 416 ff).

2. Paul's Teaching

Ritschl and many modern scholars are disposed to reject all philosophy in religion. They say, "Back to Christ." Paul was only a human interpreter of Jesus. But he was a Divinely-guided interpreter, and we need his first-hand interpretations of Jesus. What has he to say as to how Christ's death saves men?

(1) The words expressing the idea of redemption.—See above on the terms of sacrifice. The classical passage containing the idea of redemption is Rom 3 24–26: "Being justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus: whom God set forth to be a propitiation, through faith, in his blood, to show his righteousness because of the passing over of the sins done aforetime, in the forbearance of God; for the showing, I say, of his righteousness at this present season: that he might himself be just, and the justifier of him that hath faith in Jesus." A fair interpretation of this passage gives us the following propositions: (a) The believer obtains right standing with God by means of, through the channel of (see Thayer, Gr-Eng. Lex., Διά, A, III, 2), redemption which is in Christ. (b) This redemption in Christ involves, or is based upon, the Divinely-purposed propitiation which Christ made in His death. (c) The design of God in making such a propitiation was the exhibition of His righteousness; i.e., the vindication of that side of His character which demands the punishment of sin, which had not been shown in former generations when His forbearance passed over men's sins. See Sanday, Comm. on Rom, in loc. The classical passage containing the other word to redeem (ἐξαγοράζω, exagorázō) is Gal 3 13: "Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law, having become a curse for us," etc. Professor E. D. Burton (AJT, October, 1907) thinks: (a) Law here means "law legalistically understood." (b) The "curse" was the verdict of the law of pure legalism, "a disclosure to man of his actual status before God on a basis of merit." (c) The redemption meant is that Christ "brought to an end the régime of law . . . . rather than deliverance of individuals through release from penalty." He bases this argument largely on the use of ἡμᾶς, hēmás, "us," meaning Jews in antithesis with τὰ ἔθνη, tá éthnē, the Gentiles (ver 14). Everett (The Gospel of Paul) thinks that Christ was cursed in that He was "crucified" (the manner not the fact of His death being the curse); that is, as Everett sees it, Christ became ceremonially unclean, and so free from the law. So does His follower by being crucified with Christ become ceremonially unclean and so free from the law. The passage seems to give us the following propositions: (a) Man under law (whether the revealed law of the OT or the moral law) is under a "curse," that is, liable to the penalty which the broken law demands. (b) Christ by His death on the cross became a "curse for us." (c) By means of Christ thus becoming a "curse for us" He delivered us, "not the Jews as a nation, but all of us, Jews and Gentiles, who believed," from the curse incurred by the breaking of the law. Professor Burton admits that the participle γενόμενος, genómenos, "becoming," may be a "participle of means" (art. cited above, 643), and so we have "Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law by becoming a curse for us." The passage at least suggests, if it does not declare, that Christ saves us by vicariously enduring the penalty to which we were exposed.

(2) The idea of reconciliation.—Paul uses the phrase "wrath of God" (Rom 1 18, etc) to express the attitude of God toward sin, an attitude of displeasure and of grief, of revulsion of holy character which demands the punishment of sin. On the other hand, God loves the sinner; love is the prompting cause of redemption through Christ (Rom 5 8; 8 32). That is, wrath is love grieving and righteousness revolting because of sin, and both phases may act simultaneously (Simon, Redemption of Man, 216, to the contrary). So Paul says, "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, not reckoning unto them their trespasses" (2 Cor 5 19). Now this word "reconcile" (katallassein) means in the active, "to receive into favor," in the passive, "to be restored to favor" (Thayer). See also Rev. and Expos, October, 1909, 600 ff, where Professor Estes shows, from Sophocles, Xenophon, Josephus, LXX and passages in the NT like Mt 5 24, that the word must mean a change in the attitude of God toward men and not merely a change of men toward God. Practically the same is taught by Meyer (Comm. on 2 Cor); Lipsius (Handcomm. zum NT); Sanday (Comm. on Rom); Denney (Exeget. Gr Test. on Rom); Lietzmann (Handbuch zum NT); Holtzmann (Neutest. Theol.); Weiss (Rel. of the NT); Pfleiderer (Paulinism); Stevens (Christian Doctrine of Salvation), and in nearly all the great comms. on Rom and 2 Cor, and by all the writers on NT theology except Beyschlag. See also RECONCILIATION; RETRIBUTION.

(3) The idea of propitiation.—Only once (Rom 3 25) does Paul use the word "propitiation." As we saw in (1) above, the redemption in Christ is based upon the propitiation which Christ made in His death. Thayer (Gr-Eng. Lex., in loc.) says the noun signifies "a means of appeasing, expiating, a propitiation, an expiatory sacrifice." He thinks it has this meaning in Rom 3 25, but refers it to the "mercy-seat" in He 9 5. Sanday (Comm. on Rom, 88) regards hilastērion as an adj. meaning "propitiatory." De Wette, Fritzsche, Meyer, Lipsius and many others take it in this sense; Gifford, Vaughan, Liddon, Ritschl think it means "mercy-seat" here as in He. But with either meaning the blood of Christ is viewed as securing the mercy of God. Propitiation of God is made by the blood of Christ, and because of that men have access to the mercy-seat where shines the glory of God in His forgiveness of man's sins. See ROMANS, EPISTLE TO THE, 9, (3).

(4) The prepositions ὑπέρ, hupér, and ἀντί, antí.—Paul never uses anti ("for," "instead of," "in place of," so Thayer) to express what Christ's sacrifice does for the sinner, but huper ("for one's safety or advantage," primarily, but also "in the place of," "instead of," so Thayer). See Rom 5 8; 8 32; 14 15; 1 Cor 11 24; 2 Cor 5 15; Gal 3 13; Eph 5 2.25; 1 Thess 5 10; 1 Tim 2 6; Tit 2 14. It is to be noted that in 1 Tim 2 6 Paul uses antilutron, "ransom," compounded with the preposition anti, but follows it with huper, which may suggest that huper is here used in the sense of anti, "in the place of."

Summing up Paul's teaching as to how Christ's sacrifice saves: (a) The propitiatory sacrifice does not "soften God, or assuage the anger of God" (as Bushnell claims the advocates of the satisfaction theories assert, Vicarious Sacrifice, 486). God is already willing to save men, His love makes the propitiatory sacrifice (Rom 5 8). God's love makes the sacrifice, not the sacrifice His willingness to save. (b) But man by breaking God's law had come under the curse, the penalty of the broken law (Gal 3 13), and so was under God's wrath (Rom 1 18), i.e. man's sin exposed him to punishment, while at the same time God's love for the sinner was grieved. (c) Christ by His sacrificial death made it possible for God to show His righteousness and love at the same time; i.e. that He did punish sin, but did love the sinner and wish to save him (Rom 3 25.26; 5 8). (d) Christ, who was sinless, suffered vicariously for sinful men. His death was not due to His sins but those of men (2 Cor 5 21). (e) His death, followed by His resurrection which marked Him off as the sinless Son of God, and so appointed the Saviour of men (Rom 1 4), was designed by God to bring men into right relation with God (Rom 3 26*b*; 2 Cor 5 21*b*). So, we may say, Paul explained the relation of Christ's death to the sinner's spiritual life by thinking of a transfer of the sinner's "curse" to Christ, which He bore on the cross, and of God's righteousness through Christ (Phil 3 9) to the sinner by faith in Christ. But we must not press this vicarious idea too far into a system of philosophy of the atonement and claim that the system is the teaching of Paul. The quantitative, commercial idea of transfer is not in Paul's mind. The language of redemption, propitiation, ransom, is largely figurative. We must feel the spiritual truth of a qualitative transfer of sin from man to Christ and of righteousness from Christ to man, and rest the matter there, so far as Paul's teaching goes. Beyond this our conclusions as to substitution as the method of atonement are results of philosophizing on Paul's teaching.

3. Teaching of Hebrews

The author of He adds nothing to Paul's teaching respecting the method whereby Christ's sacrifice operates in saving men. His purpose to produce an apology showing forth the superior efficacy of Christ's high-priestly sacrifice over that of the Aaronic priesthood fixes his first thought on the efficacy of the sacrifice rather than on its mode of operation. He does use the words "redemption" (9 12; cf ver 15), "propitiate" (2 17), and emphasizes the opening up of the heavenly holy of holies by the high-priestly sacrifice of Christ (the way of access to the very presence of God by Christ's death, 10 19.20), which gives us data for forming a system based on a real propitiation for sin and reconciliation of God similar to the Pauline teaching formulated above.

4. Petrine and Johannine Teaching

Peter asserts that Christ suffered vicariously (1 Pet 2 22–24), who, although He "did no sin," "his own self bare our sins in his body upon the tree"; who "suffered for sins once, the righteous for [huper, not anti] the unrighteous" (1 Pet 3 18). But Peter goes no farther than Paul (perhaps not so far) in elaborating how Jesus' vicarious suffering saves the sinner. The Johannine writings contain the propitiatory idea (1 Jn 2 2; 4 10), although John writes to emphasize the incarnation and not the work of the Incarnate One (Jn 1 1–18; 1 Jn 4 2.3).

To sum up the NT teachings on the mode or operation: Jesus asserts His vicarious suffering (Mk 10 45; cf Jn 10 11) and hints at the mode of its operation by using the "ransom" figure. Paul, Peter and John teach that Christ's sacrifice was vicarious, and all but Peter suggest the idea of propitiation as to the mode of its operation. There is no direct discussion of what propitiation means.

VI. Rationale of the Efficacy of Christ's Sacrifice.—Jesus emphasizes His voluntary spirit in making the sacrifice. "The Son of man also came . . . . to give his life a ransom." The sacrifice was voluntary, not compulsory. God did not force Him to lay down His life; He chose to do so (cf Jn 10 11). But Jesus gives us no philosophy on this or any other element in His sacrifice as being the ground of its efficacy.

1. Jesus' Teaching

2. Paul's Teaching

Paul also emphasizes the voluntary gift of Christ (Gal 2 20), but he urges rather the dignity of Him who makes the sacrifice as a ground of its efficacy. It is the sacrifice of God's Son, shown to be such in His resurrection (Rom 1 4; 4 25*b*). It was no ordinary man but the sinless Son who gave "himself" (Gal 2 20). It was not merely a dying Christ but the Son who rose again "in power" (Rom 1 4), who secures our "justification" (Rom 4 25*b;* 1 Cor 15 3.4.17*b*). Paul also emphasizes the sinless life and character of Jesus as a ground of efficacy in Christ's sacrifice, "who knew no sin" in His life experience (2 Cor 5 21*a*).

3. The Teaching in Hebrews

The author of He, most of all NT writers, elaborates the grounds of efficacy in Christ's sacrifice. (1) It was a personal not an animal sacrifice (9 12–14; 9 26, "sacrifice of himself"; 10 4). (2) It was the sacrifice of the Son of God (3 5). (3) It was a royal person who made the sacrifice (6 20*b;* 7 1, "after the order of Melchizedek . . . . king of Salem"). (4) It was a sinless person (7 26.27; 9 14; 10 10.12). Westcott, Comm. on He, 298, well says, "It becomes necessary, therefore, in order to gain a complete view of the Sacrifice of Christ, to combine with the crowning act upon the Cross His fulfilment of the will of God from first to last, the Sacrifice of Life with the Sacrifice of Death." (5) It was an eternal person (6 20, "for ever"; 7 16, "after the power of an endless [m "indissoluble"] life"). The author of He reaches the climax of his argument for the superior efficacy of Christ's sacrifice when he represents Him as entering the holy of holies in the very presence of God to complete the offering for man's sin (8 1.2; 9 11.12.24).

Peter and John do not discuss the ground of efficacy, and so add nothing to our conclusions above. The efficacy of the sacrifice is suggested by describing the glory of the person (1 Pet 1 19; 2 22.23; 1 Jn 1 7*b;* 2 2).

To sum up our conclusion as to the efficacy of Christ's sacrifice: Jesus and the leading NT writers intimate that the efficacy of His sacrifice centers in His personality. Jesus, Peter and John do not discuss the subject directly. Paul, though discussing it more extensively, does not do so fully, but the author of He centers and culminates his argument for the finality of Christianity, in the superior efficacy of Christ's sacrifice, which is grounded in His personality, Divine, royal, sinless, eternal (see Ménégoz, Théol. de l'Ep. aux Hébreux). It is easy to see, from the position taken by the author of He, how Anselm in Cur Deus Homo developed his theory of satisfaction, according to which the Divinity in Christ gave His atoning sacrifice its priceless worth in God's eyes.

VII. The Human Conditions of Application.—The sacrificial death of Christ is universal in its objective potentiality, according to Jesus (Lk 24 47, "unto all the nations"); according to Paul (Rom 1 5; 5 18; 11 32; 2 Cor 5 14.15; Gal 3 14); according to the author of He (2 9, "taste of death for every man"); according to John (1 Jn 2 2, "propitiation . . . . for the whole world").

1. Universal in Objective Potentiality

2. Efficacious When Subjectively Applied

But the objective redemption to be efficacious must be subjectively applied. The blood of Christ is the universally efficacious remedy for the sin-sick souls of men, but each man must make the subjective application. How is the application made? And the threefold answer is, by repentance, by faith, and by obedience.

(1) By repentance.—The Baptist and Jesus emphasized repentance (change of mind first of all, then change of relation and of life) as the condition of entrance into the kingdom and of enjoyment of the Messianic salvation (Mt 3 2; Mk 1 15). Peter preached repentance at Pentecost and immediately after as a means of obtaining forgiveness (Acts 2 38; 3 19, etc). Paul, although emphasizing faith, also stressed repentance as an element in the human condition of salvation (Acts 20 21; Rom 2 4, etc). John (Rev 2, 3, passim) emphasizes repentance, though not stressing it as a means of receiving the benefits of redemption.

(2) By faith.—Jesus connected faith with repentance (Mk 1 15) as the condition of receiving the Messianic salvation. Paul makes faith the all-inclusive means of applying the work of Christ. The gospel is "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth" (Rom 1 16); "whom God set forth to be a propitiation, through faith" (3 25); "faith [not works] is reckoned for righteousness" (4 5); "justified by faith" (5 1). In Gal, the letters to the Cor, in the Captivity and the Pastoral Epp. he emphasizes faith as the sole condition of receiving salvation. But what kind of faith is it that appropriates the saving benefit of Christ's death? Not historical or intellectual but "heart" faith (Rom 10 10). To Paul "heart" meant the seat or essence of the whole personality, and so faith which applies the redemption in Christ is the personal commitment of one's self to Christ as Saviour and Lord (2 Cor 5 15). See Thayer, Gr-Eng. Lex., πιστεύω, pisteúō, 1, b, γ, for a particular discussion of the meaning of faith in this sense. The author of He discusses esp. faith as a conquering power, but also implies that it is the condition of entrance upon the life of spiritual rest and fellowship (chs 3 and 4, passim). Peter (1 Pet 1 9) and John (1 Jn 3 23; 4 16; 5 1.5, etc) also regard faith as a means of applying the saving benefits of Christ's death.

(3) By obedience in sacrificial service.—Jesus said, "If any man would come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me" (Mk 8 34). Here He lays down two elements in the conditions of discipleship, denying one's self and taking up his cross. The former means the renunciation of self as the center of thought, faith, hope and life. The latter means the life of sacrifice. Jesus was stressing this truth when He uttered that incomparable saying, "The Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many" (Mk 10 45 ∥ Mt 20 28). Paul also emphasizes this phase of the human condition of salvation when he shows how sanctification grows spontaneously out of justification (Rom 6 8) and when he says that what "avails" is "faith working through love" (Gal 5 6). The author of He says, "He became unto all them that obey him the author [Gr αἴτιος, aítios, "cause"] of eternal salvation" (5 9). Peter and John, the latter esp., emphasize the keeping of His commandments, the life of service, as the means of appropriating to the fullest the saving benefits of Christ's death. The theologians in classrooms and preachers in the pulpits have failed to emphasize this aspect of "saving faith" as did Jesus, Paul, the author of He, and John. In the NT salvation is a process as well as an instantaneous act on the part of God, and the process is carried on by means of obedience, the life of service, which appropriates by faith the dynamic of Christ's sacrifice.

VIII. The Christian's Life the Life of Sacrifice.—This discussion of the faith that "obeys" leads to the consideration of that climactic thought of NT writers, namely, that the Christian's life is sacrificial living based on Christ's sacrifice for him. We note in outline the following:

The Christian's life of sacrifice is the logical consequence of Christ's sacrificial death. The Christ who sacrificed Himself for the believer is now continuing the sacrifice in the believer's life

1. Consequence of Christ's Sacrifice

(Gal 2 20; Phil 1 21). Paul was crucified when Christ was crucified (in a bold mystic figure), and the life of Christ which sacrificed itself on the cross and perpetuates itself in resurrection power now operates as a mighty dynamic for the apostle's moral and spiritual transformation (Phil 3 10.11). It is to be noted, Jesus also emphasized this kind of living, though not so expressly connecting the believer's sacrificial life with His sacrificial death (see Mk 8 34 f).

2. Christ's Death the Appeal for Christian's Sacrifice

Christ's sacrificial death becomes the persuasive appeal for the Christian's sacrificial life, "Because we thus judge, that one died for all, therefore all died; and he died for all, that they that live should no longer live unto themselves, but unto him who for their sakes died and rose again" (2 Cor 5 14.15). Because He died for us we should live for Him. But what is the appeal which Christ's sacrificial death makes to the saved sinner? "The love of Christ constraineth us" (2 Cor 5 14). Christ's death on the cross exhibits His love, unspeakable, unthinkable love, for it was love for His "enemies" (Rom 5 10), and that matchless love kindles love in the forgiven sinner's heart. He is willing to do anything, even to die, for his Saviour who died for him (Acts 21 13; Phil 1 29.30). It is a greater privilege for the saved sinner to suffer for Christ than it is to believe on Him. Peter (1 Pet 3 17.18), the author of He (12; 13 13) and John (1 Jn 3 16; 4 16–19) emphasize this truth.

3. Necessary to Fill Out Christ's Sacrifice

The Christian's sacrifice is necessary to fill out Christ's sacrifice. "Now I rejoice in my sufferings for your sake, and fill up on my part that which is lacking of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh for his body's sake, which is the church" (Col 1 24). Roman Catholic exegetes have made the apostle teach that the sufferings of the saints, along with Christ's sufferings, have atoning efficacy. But Paul nowhere intimates that his sufferings avail for putting away sins. We may hold with Weiss (Comm. on the NT) that Paul longed to experience in his life the perfect sacrificial spirit as Christ did; or with Alford (in loc.) that he wished to suffer his part of Christ's sufferings to be endured by him through His church; or, as it seems to us, he longed to make effective by his ministry of sacrificial service to as many others as possible the sacrificial death of Christ. Christ's sacrifice avails in saving men only when Christians sacrifice their lives in making known this sacrifice of Christ.

4. Content of the Christian's Sacrifice

(1) The Christian is to present his personality (Rom 15 16). Paul commends the Macedonians for "first" giving "their own selves to the Lord" (2 Cor 8 5). (2) Christians must present their "bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God" (Rom 12 1). In the old system of sacrifices the animals were offered as dead; Christians are to offer their bodies, all their members with their powers, to God a "living sacrifice," i.e. a sacrifice which operates in lives of holiness and service (see also Rom 6 13.19). (3) Christians must offer their money or earthly possessions to God. Paul speaks of the gift from the church at Philippi as "a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God" (Phil 4 18). This gift was to the apostle a beautiful expression of the sacrificial spirit imparted to them because they had the "mind" of Christ who "emptied himself, ... becoming obedient even unto death, yea, the death of the cross" (2 5–8). The author of He (13 16) exhorts his readers, "But to do good and to communicate forget not: for with such sacrifices God is well pleased." (4) The general exercise of all our gifts and graces is viewed by Peter as sacrificial living (1 Pet 2 5): "Ye also, as living stones, are built up a spiritual house, to be a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices," etc. All Christians are priests and daily offer up their burnt offerings acceptable to God, if they 'suffer as Christians' (1 Pet 2 20; 3 18) in the exercise of their graces and powers.

But how do these sacrifices of the Christian affect him and God? The NT writers never hint that our sacrifices propitiate God, or so win His favor that He will or can on account of our sacrifices forgive our sins. They are "well-pleasing" to Him, a "sweet odor"; that is, they win His approval of our lives thus lived according to the standard which Christ gives us. Their influence on us is the increase of our spiritual efficiency and power and finally a greater capacity for enjoying spiritual blessings in heaven (1 Cor 3 14).

5. The Supper as a Sacrifice

Some scholars (Roman Catholic, Episcopalian, etc) regard the memorial supper as a kind of sacrifice which the Christian offers in worship. Neither Jesus, Paul, the author of He, Peter, or John, ever hints that in eating the bread and drinking the wine the Christian offers a sacrifice to God in Christ. Paul teaches that in partaking of the Supper we "proclaim the Lord's death till he come" (1 Cor 11 26). That is, instead of offering a sacrifice ourselves to God, in partaking of the Supper we proclaim the offering of Christ's sacrifice for us. Milligan argues that as Christ in heaven perpetually offers Himself for us, so we on earth, in the Supper, offer ourselves to Him (Heavenly Priesthood, 266). Even Cave (Spiritual Doctrine of Sacrifice, 439) maintains, "In a certain loose sense the Lord's Supper may be called a sacrifice." See the above books for the argument supporting this position.

To sum up our conclusions on sacrifice in the NT:

(1) Jesus and NT writers regard the OT sacrificial system as from God, but imperfect, the various sacrifices serving only as types of the one great sacrifice which Christ made.

(2) All the writers, except James and Jude, with Jesus, emphasize the sacrificial idea, Jesus less, giving only two hints of His sacrificial death (in the Synoptic Gospels), the author of He putting the climactic emphasis on Christ's sacrifice as the sacrifice of atonement.

(3) As to the relation of Christ's sacrifice to man's salvation, the latter is the achievement of the former, so expressed only twice by Jesus, but emphatically so declared by Paul, the author of He, Peter, and John (Paul and He laying most emphasis on this point).

(4) As to how Christ's sacrifice saves men, Jesus, the author of He, Peter and John suggest the idea of propitiation, while Paul emphatically teaches that man is under a curse, exposed to the displeasure of God, and that Christ's sacrifice secured the reconciliation of God by vindicating His righteousness in punishing sin and His love in saving sinners. Jesus and the leading NT writers agree that Christ saves men through His vicarious suffering.

(5) As to the rational basis of efficacy in Christ's sacrifice, there is no direct discussion in the NT except by the author of He who grounds its final, eternal efficacy in Christ's personality, Divine, royal, sinless and eternal.

(6) As to the conditions of applying Christ's sacrifice, repentance and faith, which lives and fruits in obedience and sacrificial living, are recognized by Jesus and all the leading NT writers as the means of appropriating the benefits of Christ's sacrifice.

(7) By Jesus, Paul, the author of He, Peter and John the Christian life is viewed as the life of sacrifice. Christ's death is at once the cause, motive, measure, and the dynamic of the Christian's sacrificial life.

C. B. Williams

SACRIFICE, HUMAN, hū'man: As an expression of religious devotion, human sacrifice has been widespread at certain stages of the race's development. The tribes of Western Asia were deeply affected by the practice, probably prior to the settlement of the Hebrews in Pal, and it continued at least down to the 5th cent. BC. At times of great calamity, anxiety and danger, parents sacrificed their children as the greatest and most costly offering which they could make to propitiate the anger of the gods and thus secure their favor and help. There is no intimation in the Bible that enemies or captives were sacrificed; only the offering of children by their parents is mentioned. The belief that this offering possessed supreme value is seen in Mic 6 6 f, where the sacrifice of the firstborn is the climax of a series of offerings which, in a rising scale of values, are suggested as a means of propitiating the angry Jeh. A striking example of the rite as actually practised is seen in 2 K 3 27, where Mesha the king of Moab (made famous by the Moabite Stone), under the stress of a terrible siege, offered his eldest son, the heir-apparent to the throne, as a burnt offering upon the wall of Kir-hareseth. As a matter of fact this horrid act seems to have had the effect of driving off the allies.

Human sacrifice was ordinarily resorted to, no doubt, only in times of great distress, but it seems to have been practised among the old Canaanitish tribes with some frequency (Dt 12 31). The Israelites are said to have borrowed it from their Can. neighbors (2 K 16 3; 2 Ch 28 3), and as a matter of fact human sacrifices were never offered to Jeh, but only to various gods of the land. The god who was most frequently worshipped in this way was Moloch or Molech, the god of the Ammonites (2 K 23 10; Lev 18 21; 20 2), but from Jeremiah we learn that the Phoen god Baal was, at least in the later period of the history, also associated with Molech in receiving this worship (Jer 19 5; 32 35).

As in the case of the Canaanites, the only specific cases of human sacrifice mentioned among the Israelites are those of the royal princes, sons of Ahaz and Manasseh, the two kings of Judah who were most deeply affected by the surrounding heathen practices and who, at the same time, fell into great national distress (2 K 16 3; 2 Ch 28 3; 2 K 21 6; 2 Ch 33 6). But it is clear from many general statements that the custom was widespread among the masses of the people as well. It is forbidden in the Mosaic legislation (Lev 18 21; 20 2–5; Dt 18 10); it is said in 2 K 17 17 that the sacrifice of sons and daughters was one of the causes of the captivity of the ten tribes. Jeremiah charges the people of the Southern Kingdom with doing the same thing (Jer 7 31; 19 5; 32 35); with these general statements agree Isa 57 5; Ezk 16 2 f; 20 31; 23 37; Ps 106 37 f. A study of these passages makes it certain that in the period immediately before the captivity of Judah, human sacrifice was by no means confined to the royal family, but was rather common among the people. Daughters as well as sons were sacrificed. It is mentioned only once in connection with the Northern Kingdom, and then only in the summary of the causes of their captivity (2 K 17 17), but the Southern Kingdom in its later years was evidently deeply affected. There were various places where the bloody rite was celebrated (Jer 19 5), but the special high place, apparently built for the purpose, was in the Valley of Tophet or Hinnom (gē-hinnōm, Gehenna) near Jerus (2 Ch 28 3; 33 6). This great high place, built for the special purpose of human sacrifice (Jer 7 31; 32 35), was defiled by the good king Josiah in the hope of eradicating the cruel practice (2 K 23 10).

The Bib. writers without exception look upon the practice with horror as the supreme point of national and religious apostasy, and a chief cause of national disaster. They usually term the rite "passing through fire," probably being unwilling to use the sacred term "sacrifice" in reference to such a revolting custom. There is no evidence of a continuance of the practice in captivity nor after the return. It is said, however, that the heathen Sepharvites, settled by the Assyr kings in the depopulated territory of the Northern Kingdom, "burnt their children in the fire to Adrammelech and Anammelech, the gods of Sepharvaim" (2 K 17 31). The practice is not heard of again, and probably rapidly died out. The restored Israelites were not affected by it. Cf Sacrifice (OT), VI, 10.

This prominent Jewish sect, though not so numerous as their opponents, the Pharisees, by their wealth and the priestly descent of many of them had an influence which fully balanced that of their more popular rivals. They were a political party, of priestly and aristocratic tendency, as against the more religious and democratic Pharisees.

I. Introductory.—The Talm form suggests derivation from the name of their founder, but the form in NT and Jos would imply connection with the vb. "to be righteous." The probability is, that the name is derived from some person named "Zadok." The most prominent Zadok in history was the Davidic high priest (2 S 8 17; 15 24; 1 K 1 35), from whom all succeeding high priests claimed to descend. It is in harmony with this, that in the NT the Sadducees are the party to whom the high priests belonged. On the authority of 'Ābhōth d^e*-Rabbī Nāthān* (c 1000 AD), another Zadok is asserted to be he from whom the Sadducees received their name. He was a disciple of Antigonus of Socho (c 250 BC) who taught that love to God should be absolutely disinterested (Pirḳē 'Ābhōth, i.3). 'Ābhōth d^e*-Rabbī Nāthān's* account of the derivation of the Sadduceanism from this teaching is purely an imaginary deduction (Charles Taylor, Sayings of the Jewish Fathers^{2}, 112). The majority of authoritative writers prefer to derive the name from Zadok, the colleague of Abiathar, the contemporary of David.

1. Name: Rival Etymologies

Our main authorities for the teaching of the Sadducees are the NT and Jos. According to the former, the Sadducees denied the resurrection of the body, and did not believe in angels or spirits (Mt 22 23; Acts 23 8). More can be learned from Jos, but his evidence is to be received with caution, as he was a Pharisee and, moreover, had the idea that the Sadducees were to be paralleled with the Epicureans. The Talm is late. Before even the Mishna was committed to writing (c 200 AD) the Sadducees had ceased to exist; before the Gemara was completed (c 700 AD) every valid tradition of their opinions must have vanished. Further, the Talm is Pharisaic. The Fathers, Origen, Hippolytus, Epiphanius and Jerome, have derived their information from late Pharisaic sources.

2. Authorities

II. Origin and History.—Jos describes the Sadducees along with the contemporary sects, the Pharisees and the Essenes (Jos, Ant, XIII, v, 9; X, vi, 2; XVIII, i, 4, 5; BJ, II, viii, 14). His earliest notice of them is after his account of the treaties of Jonathan with the Romans and the Lacedemonians. He indicates his belief that the parties were ancient; but if so, they must have formerly had other names. It has been suggested that the earlier form of the conflict between the Sadducees and Pharisees was opposition between the priests and the prophets. This, however, is not tenable; in the Southern Kingdom there was no such opposition; whatever the state of matters in the Northern Kingdom, it could have had no influence on opinion in Judaea and Galilee in the time of Our Lord. By others the rivalry is supposed to be inherited from that between the scribes and the priests, but Ezra, the earliest scribe, in the later sense of the term, was a priest with strong sacerdotal sympathies.

1. Early Notices in Josephus

Probably the priestly party only gradually crystallized into the sect of the Sadducees. After the return from the exile, the high priest drew to himself all powers, civil and religious. To the Pers authorities he was as the king of the Jews. The high priest and those about him were the persons who had to do with the heathen supreme government and the heathen nationalities around; this association would tend to lessen their religious fervor, and, by reaction, this roused the zeal of a section of the people for the law. With the Gr domination the power of the high priests at home was increased, but they became still more subservient to their heathen masters, and were the leaders in the Hellenizing movement. They took no part in the Maccabean struggle, which was mainly supported by their opponents the ḥăṣīdhīm, as they were called (the Hasidaeans of 1 Macc 2 42, etc). When the ḥăṣīdhīm, having lost sympathy with the Maccabeans, sought to reconcile themselves to the priestly party, Alcimus, the legitimate high priest, by his treachery and cruelty soon renewed the breach. The Hasmoneans then were confirmed in the high-priesthood, but were only lukewarmly supported by the ḥăṣīdhīm.

2. Tendencies toward Hellenism

The division between the Hasmoneans and the ḥăṣīdhīm, or, as they were now called, Pharisees, culminated in the insult offered by Eleazar to John Hyrcanus, the Hasmonean high priest (Jos, Ant, XIII, x, 5). Alexander Jannaeus, the son of Hyrcanus, became a violent partisan of the Sadducees, and crucified large numbers of the Pharisees. Toward the end of his life he fell out of sympathy with the Sadducees, and on his deathbed recommended his wife Alexandra Salome, who as guardian to his sons succeeded him, to favor the Pharisees, which she did. In the conflict between her two sons, John Hyrcanus II and Aristobulus II, the Sadducees took the side of Aristobulus, the younger and abler brother. So long as the contest was between Jews, the Sadducean candidate prevailed. When the Romans were called in, they gave the advantage to Hyrcanus.

3. Favored by Jannaeus; Put in Background by Alexandra Salome

Thrown into the background by the overthrow of their candidate for the high-priesthood, they soon regained their influence. They allied themselves with the Herodians who had supported Hyrcanus, but were subservient to Rome. Though they were not theological at first, they became so, to defend their policy against the attacks of the Pharisees. A historic parallel may be found in the Cavaliers of the reign of Charles I, as over against the Puritans.

4. Become a Religious Party

The Sadducees at first regarded the struggle between Our Lord and the Pharisees as a matter with which they had no concern. It was not until Our Lord claimed to be the Messiah, and the excitement of the people consequent on this proved likely to draw the attention of the Rom authorities, that they intervened. Should Tiberius learn that there was widespread among the Jews the belief in the coming of a Jewish king who was to rule the world, and that one had appeared who claimed to be this Messiah, very soon would the quasi-independence enjoyed by the Jews be taken from them, and with this the influence of the Sadducees would depart. An oligarchy is proverbially sensitive to anything that threatens its stability; a priesthood is unmeasured in its vindictiveness; and the Sadducees were a priestly oligarchy. Hence it is not wonderful that only the death of Jesus would satisfy them.

5. Fear Roman Interference if Jesus' Messianic Claims Are Recognized

6. Continue Antagonistic to Apostles after Christ's Departure

After the resurrection, the Pharisees became less hostile to the followers of Christ; but the Sadducees maintained their attitude of suspicion and hatred (Acts 4 1). Although a Pharisee, it was as agent of the Sadducean high priest that Paul persecuted the believers. The Sadducees gained complete ascendency in the Sanhedrin, and later, under the leadership of Annas, or as he is sometimes called by Jos, Ananus, the high priest, they put James the brother of Our Lord to death (Jos, Ant, XX, ix, 1) with many others, presumably Christians. The Pharisees were against these proceedings; and even sent messengers to meet Albinus who was coming to succeed Festus as governor to entreat him to remove Annas from the high-priesthood.

7. Fall of Sadducean Party

With the outbreak of the Jewish war, the Sadducees with their allies the Herodians were driven into the background by the Zealots, John of Gischala and Simon ben Gioras. Annas and Joshua, also called high priest by Jos, were both put to death by the Zealots and their Idumaean allies (Jos, BJ, IV, v, 2). With the destruction of the temple and the fall of the Jewish state the Sadducean party disappeared.

III. Doctrines of the Sadducees.—As the sacerdotal party, the Sadducees laid great stress on the ceremonial of sacrifice, and rejected the changes introduced by their opponents unless these found support in the words of the Law.

1. Ceremonial Exactness

2. Disbelief in Spiritual World and Resurrection

The most prominent doctrine of the Sadducees was the denial of the immortality of the soul and of the resurrection of the body. The Pharisees believed that Moses had delivered these doctrines to the elders, and that they had in turn handed them on to their successors. The Sadducees rejected all these traditions. From Acts (23 8) we learn that they believed in neither "angel or spirit." As appearances of angels are mentioned in the Law, it is difficult to harmonize their reverence for the Law with this denial. They may have regarded these angelophanies as theophanies. Jos distinctly asserts (Ant, XVIII, i, 4) that the Sadducees believe that the soul dies with the body. They deny, he says, Divine providence (BJ, II, viii, 14). Their theology might be called "religion within the limits of mere sensation."

3. Alleged Belief in Canonicity of Pentateuch Alone

The Fathers, Hippolytus, Origen and Jerome, credit the Sadducees with regarding the Pent as alone canonical (Hipp., Haer., ix.24; Orig., Contra Celsum, i.49; on Mt 22 24–31; Jer on Mt 22 31.32). This idea may be due to a false identification of the views of the Sadducees with those of the Samaritans. Had they rejected all the rest of Scripture, it is hardly possible that Jos would have failed to notice this. The Talm does not mention this among their errors. It is certain that they gave more importance to the Pent than to any other of the books of Scripture. Hence Our Lord, in the passage commented on by Origen and Jerome, appeals to the Law rather than to the Prophets or the Pss. It follows from the little value they put upon the Prophets that they had no sympathy with the Messianic hopes of the Pharisees.

4. Relation to Epicureanism

It need hardly be said that there was no real connection between Sadduceanism and the doctrines of Epicurus. There was a superficial resemblance which was purely accidental. Their favor for Hellenism would give a color to this identification.

IV. Character of the Sadducees.—Jos says that while the Pharisees have amiable manners and cultivate concord among all, the Sadducees are "very boorish" (BJ, II, viii, 14). This want of manners is not a characteristic usually associated with an aristocracy, or with supple diplomats, yet it suits what we find in the NT. The cruel horseplay indulged in when Our Lord was tried before the irregular meeting of the Sanhedrin (Mt 26 67.68), the shout of Ananias at the trial of Paul before the same tribunal to "smite him on the mouth," show them to be rough and overbearing. What Jos relates of the conduct of Annas (or Ananus) in regard to James, above referred to, agrees with this. Jos, however, does not always speak in such condemnatory terms of Ananus—in BJ (IV, v, 2) he calls him "a man venerable and most just." Only the violence which, as Jos relates in the chapter immediately preceding that from which we have quoted, Ananus resorted to against the Zealots better suits the earlier verdict of Jos than the later. As to their general character Jos mentions that when the Sadducees became magistrates they conformed their judgments to Pharisaic opinion, otherwise they would not have been tolerated (Ant, XVIII, i, 4).

1. Characterized as Rough and Boorish

2. Talmudic Accounts

As noted above, the Talm account is untrustworthy, late and Pharisaic. The Gemara from which most of the references are taken was not committed to writing till 7 centuries after Christ—when the traditions concerning the Sadducees, such as had survived, had filtered through 20 generations of Pharisaism. Despite this lengthened time and suspicious medium, there may be some truth in the representations of the Talmudic rabbin. In Peṣāḥīm 57a* it is said, "Woe's me on account of the house of Beothus, woe's me on account of their spears; woe's me on account of the house of Hanun [Annas], woe's me on account of their serpent brood; woe's me on account of the house of Kathros, woe's me on account of their pen; woe's me on account of the house of Ishmael ben Phabi; woe's me on account of their fists. They are high priests and their sons are treasurers of the temple, and their sons-in-law, assistant treasurers; and their servants beat the people with sticks." As these are Sadducean names, this passage exhibits Pharisaic tradition as to the habits of the Sadducees.

3. Relation to Temple and Its Worship

The Sadducean high priests made Hophni and Phinehas too much their models. Annas and his sons had booths in the courts of the temple for the sale of sacrificial requisites, tables for money-changers, as ordinary coins had to be changed into the shekels of the sanctuary. From all these the priests of the high-priestly caste derived profit at the expense of desecrating the temple (Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus, I, 371 ff). They did not, as did the Pharisees, pay spiritual religion the homage of hypocrisy; they were frankly irreligious. While officials of religion, they were devoid of its spirit. This, however, represents their last stage.

4. Sadducean Literature

The favor for the memory of John Hyrcanus shown by the writer of 1 Macc (16 23.24) renders probable Geiger's opinion that the author was a Sadducee. He shows the party in its best form: his outlook on life is eminently sane, and his history is trustworthy. He has sympathy with the patriotism of the Hasidaeans, but none with the religious scruples which led them to desert Judas Maccabaeus. That the writer of Ecclus from his silence as to the national expectation of a Messiah and the hope of a future life was also a Sadducee, is almost certain.

V. The Relation of the Sadducees to Jesus.

1. Less Denounced by Jesus Than the Pharisees

—As the doctrines and practices of the Sadducees were quite alien from the teaching of Our Lord and the conduct He enjoined, it is a problem why He did not denounce them more frequently than He did. Indeed He never denounces the Sadducees save along with their opponents the Pharisees; whereas He frequently denounces the Pharisees alone. As His position, both doctrinal and practical, was much nearer that of the Pharisees, it was necessary that He should clearly mark Himself off from them. There was not the same danger of His position being confused with that of the Sadducees. Jos informs us that the Sadducees had influence with the rich; Jesus drew His adherents chiefly from the poor, from whom also the Pharisees drew. The latter opposed Him all the more that He was sapping their source of strength; hence He had to defend Himself against them. Further, the Gospels mainly recount Our Lord's ministry in Galilee, whereas the Sadducees were chiefly to be found in Jerus and its neighborhood; hence there may have been severe denunciations of the Sadducees that have not come down to us.

2. Attitude toward Jesus

The Sadducees probably regarded Jesus as a harmless fanatic who by His denunciations was weakening the influence of the Pharisees. Only when His claim to be the Messiah brought Him within the sphere of practical politics did they desire to intervene. When they did determine to come into conflict with Jesus, they promptly decreed His arrest and death; only the arrest was to be secret, "lest a tumult arise among the people" (Mt 26 5). In their direct encounter with Our Lord in regard to the resurrection (Mt 22 25 ff; Mk 12 20 ff; Lk 20 29 ff), there is an element of contempt implied in the illustration which they bring, as if till almost the end they failed to take Him seriously. For Literature see PHARISEES.

SADDUK, sad′uk (A [Fritzsche], Σάδδουκος, Sáddoukos, B, Σαδδούλουκος, Saddoúloukos; AV Sadduc): The high priest, an ancestor of Ezra (1 Esd 8 2) = "Zadok" in Ezr 7 2 = "Sadoc" in 2 Esd 1 1.

SADOC, sā′dok:

(1) (Lat Sadoch): An ancestor of Ezra (2 Esd 1 1) = "Zadok" in Ezr 7 2 = "Sadduk" in 1 Esd 8 2.

(2) (Σαδώκ, Sadôk): A descendant of Zerubbabel and ancestor of Jesus (Mt 1 14).

SAFFRON, saf′run (כַּרְכֹּם, karkōm; κρόκος, krókos): Identical with the Arab. kurḳum, the same as zaʿfarān, "saffron." The source of the true saffron is Crocus sativus (N.O. Indaceae), a plant cultivated in Pal; there are 8 wild varieties in all of which, as in the cultivated species, the orange-colored styles and stigmas yield the yellow dye, saffron. Cant 4 14 probably refers to the C. sativus. There is a kind of bastard saffron plant, the Carthamus tinctorius (N.O. Compositae), of which the orange-colored flowers yield a dye like saffron.

SAIL, sāl, SAILOR, sāl′ẽr. See SHIPS AND BOATS, II, 2, (3); III, 2.

SAINTS, sānts: In AV 3 words are thus rendered: (1) קָדוֹשׁ, ḳādhōsh (in Dnl the same root occurs several times in its Aram. form, קַדִּישׁ, ḳaddīsh); (2) חָסִיד, ḥāṣīdh, and (3) ἅγιοι, hágioi. Of these words (2) has in general the meaning of righteousness or goodness, while (1) and (3) have the meaning of consecration and Divine claim and ownership. They are not primarily words of character, like ḥāṣīdh, but express a relation to God as being set apart for His own. Wherever ḳādhōsh refers to angels, the rendering "holy one" or "holy ones" has been substituted in RV for AV "saint" or "saints," which is the case also in Ps 106 16 m (cf 34 9), and in 1 S 2 9, as the tr of ḥāṣīdh.

While hagioi occurs more frequently in the NT than does ḳādhōsh in the OT, yet both are applied with practical uniformity to the company of God's people rather than to any individual. Perhaps the rendering "saints" cannot be improved, but it is necessary for the ordinary reader constantly to guard against the idea that NT saintship was in any way a result of personal character, and consequently that it implied approval of moral attainment already made. Such a rendering as "consecrate ones," for example, would bring out more clearly the relation to God which is involved, but, besides the fact that it is not a happy tr, it might lead to other errors, for it is not easy to remember that consecration—the setting apart of the individual as one of the company whom God has in a peculiar way as His own—springs not from man, but from God Himself, and that consequently it is in no way something optional, and admits of no degrees of progress, but, on the contrary, is from the beginning absolute duty. It should also be noted that while, as has been said, to be a saint is not directly and primarily to be good but to be set apart by God as His own, yet the godly and holy character ought inevitably and immediately to result. When God consecrates and claims moral beings for Himself and His service, He demands that they should go on to be fit for and worthy of the relation in which He has placed them, and so we read of certain actions as performed "worthily of the saints" (Rom 16 2) and as such "as becometh saints" (Eph 5 3). The thought of the holy character of the "saints," which is now so common as almost completely to obscure the real thought of the NT writers, already lay in their thinking very close to their conception of saintship as consecration by God to be His own. DAVID FOSTER ESTES

SALA, SALAH, sā'la (שֶׁלַח, shelaḥ, "a missile," "petition"; Σαλά, Salá): A son of Arpachshad (AV Gen 10 24; 11 13 ff; 1 Ch 1 18.24). Lk 3 35.36 follows LXX of Gen 10 24; 11 12=SHELAH (q.v.).

SALAMIEL, sa-lā'mi-el (B A, Σαλαμιήλ, Salamiḗl, א, Σαμαμιήλ, Samamiḗl): An ancestor of Judith (Jth 8 1)=AV "Samael"="Shelumiel."

SALAMIS, sal'a-mis (Σαλαμίς, Salamís): A town on the east coast of Cyprus, situated some 3 miles to the N. of the mediaeval and modern Famagusta. It lay near the river Pediaeus, at the eastern extremity of the great plain of the Mesoréa, which runs far into the interior of the island toward Nicosia (Lefkosia), the present capital. It possessed a good harbor and was the most populous and flourishing town of Cyprus in the Hellenic and Rom periods, carrying on a vigorous trade with the ports of Cilicia and Syria. Its population was mixed, consisting of Gr and Phoen elements. The former, however, gave its tone and color to the city, and the chief cult and temple were those of Salaminian Zeus.

2. Early History

Tradition represented Salamis as founded soon after the fall of Troy by Teucer, the prince of Gr archers according to the narrative of the Iliad, who named it after his home, the island of Salamis off the Attic coast. In the 6th cent. BC it figures as an important Hellenic city, ruled by a line of kings reputed to be descended from Teucer and strengthened by an alliance with Cyrene (Herod. iv.162). Gorgus, who was on the throne in 498 BC, refused to join the Ionic revolt against Persia, but the townsmen, led by his brother Onesilus, took up arms in the struggle for freedom. A crushing defeat, however, inflicted under the walls of Salamis, restored the island to its Pers overlords, who reinstated Gorgus as a vassal prince (Herod. v.103 ff). In 449 a Gr fleet under Athenian leadership defeated the Phoen navy, which was in the service of Persia, off Salamis; but the Athenian withdrawal which followed the battle led to a decided anti-Hellenic reaction, until the able and vigorous rule of the Salaminian prince Euagoras, who was a warm friend of the Athenians (Isocrates, Euag.) and a successful champion of Hellenism. In 306 a second great naval battle was fought off Salamis, in which Demetrius Poliorcetes defeated the forces of Ptolemy I (Soter), king of Egypt. But 11 years later the town came into Ptolemy's hands and, with the rest of the island, remained an appanage of the Egyp kingdom until the incorporation of Cyprus in the Rom Empire (58 BC).

3. Visit of the Apostles

When Barnabas and Paul, accompanied by John Mark, set out on their 1st missionary journey, they sailed from Seleucia, the seaport of Antioch, and landed at Salamis, about 130 miles distant, as the harbor nearest to the Syrian coast. There they preached the gospel in the "synagogues of the Jews" (Acts 13 5); the phrase is worth noting as pointing to the existence of several synagogues and thus of a large Jewish community in Salamis. Of work among the Gentiles we hear nothing, nor is any indication given either of the duration of the apostles' visit or of the success of their mission; but it would seem that after a short stay they proceeded "through the whole island" (Acts 13 6 RV) to Paphos. The words seem to imply that they visited all, or at least most, of the towns in which there were Jewish communities. Paul did not return to Salamis, but Barnabas doubtless went there on his 2d missionary journey (Acts 15 39), and tradition states that he was martyred there in Nero's reign, on the site marked by the monastery named after him.

4. Later History

In 116 AD the Jews in Cyprus rose in revolt and massacred 240,000 Greeks and Romans. The rising was crushed with the utmost severity by Hadrian. Salamis was almost depopulated, and its destruction was afterward consummated by earthquakes in 332 and 342 AD. It was rebuilt, though on a much smaller scale, by the emperor Constantius II (337–61 AD) under the name Constantia, and became the metropolitan see of the island. The most famous of its bishops was Epiphanius, the staunch opponent of heresy, who held the see from 367 to 403. In 647 the city was finally destroyed by the Saracens. Considerable remains of ancient buildings still remain on the site; an account of the excavations carried on there in 1890 by Messrs. J. A. R. Munro and H. A. Tubbs under the auspices of the Cyprus Exploration Fund will be found in the Journal of Hellenic Studies, XII, 59–198.

SALASADAI, sal-a-sad'ā-ī (A, Σαλασαδαί, Salasadaí, B, Σαρασαδαί, Sarasadaí, א, Σαρισαδαί, Sarisadaí): An ancestor of Judith (Jth 8 1).

SALATHIEL, sa-lā'thi-el:

(1) (Σαλαθιήλ, Salathiḗl): AV; Gr form of "Shealtiel" (thus RV). The father of Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 5.48.56; 6 2; Mt 1 12; Lk 3 27).

(2) RV: Another name of Esdras (2 Esd 3 1, "Salathiel").

SALE, sāl (מִמְכָּר, mimkār): The word is used: (1) in the sense of the transaction (Lev 25 50); (2) in the sense of the limit of time involved in the transaction (Lev 25 27); (3) in the sense of the price paid in the transaction (Dt 18 8), though it may be the same as (1) above.

SALECAH, sal'ē-ka, SALCAH, SALCHAH, sal'-ka (סַלְכָה, ṣalᵉkhāh; B, Σεκχαί, Sekchaí, 'Αχά, Achá, Σελά, Selá, A, 'Ελχά, Elchá, 'Ασελχά, Aselchá, Σελχά, Selchá): This place first appears in Dt 3 10 as marking the eastern boundary of Bashan. It is named as one of the cities in which Og, king of Bashan, ruled (Josh 12 5). It must certainly have been included in the portion given to the half-tribe of Manasseh, "all the kingdom of Og king of Bashan," although it is not named among the cities that fell to him (Josh 13 29 ff). At a later time we are told that Gad dwelt over against the Reubenites in the land of Bashan unto Salecah (1 Ch 5 11). The boundaries of the tribes probably changed from time to time.

The ancient city is represented by the modern Ṣalkhad, a city in a high and strong position at the southern end of Jebel ed-Drūze (the Mountain of Bashan). On a volcanic hill rising some 300 ft. above the town, in what must have been the crater, stands the castle. The view from the battlements, as the present writer can testify, is one of the finest E. of the Jordan, including the rich hollow of the Ḥaurān, Mt. Hermon, and all the intervening country to the mountains of Samaria, with vast reaches of the desert to the S. and to the E. The old Rom roads are still clearly seen running without curve or deviation across the country to Bozrah and Ḍer'ah, away to the S.E. over the desert to Ḳal'at el-'Azraḳ, and eastward to the Pers Gulf. The castle was probably built by the Romans. Restored by the Arabs, it was a place of strength in Crusading times. It has now fallen on evil days. The modern town, containing many ancient houses, lies mainly on the slopes S.E. of the castle. The inhabitants are Druzes, somewhat noted for turbulence. In the recent rising of the Druzes (1911) the place suffered heavily from bombardment by the Turks. For water-supply it is entirely dependent on cisterns filled during the rainy season.

1. Identification and Meaning

SALEM, sā′lem (שָׁלֵם, shālēm; Σαλήμ, Salḗm): The name of the city of which Melchizedek was king (Gen 14 18; He 7 1.2; cf Ps 76 2). To all appearance it lay near "the Vale of Shaveh," described as "the King's Vale." The general opinion among the Jews was that Salem was the same as Jerus, as stated by Jos (Ant, I, x, 2), who adds (VII, iii, 2) that it was known as Solyma (Σόλυμα, Sóluma, variants, according to Whiston, Salem and Hierosolyma) in the time of Abraham. It was also reported that the city and its temple were called Solyma by Homer, and he adds that the name in Heb means "security." This identification with Jerus was accepted by Onkelos and all the Tgs, as well as by the early Christians. The Samaritans have always identified Salem with Salim, E. of Nablūs, but Jewish and Christian tradition is more likely to be correct, supported, as it is, by Ps 76 2.

2. Testimony of Tell el-Amarna Tablets

The testimony of the Am Tab is apparently negative. Knudtzon's no. 287 mentions "the land" and "the lands of Urusalim," twice with the prefix for "city"; no. 289 likewise has this prefix twice; and no. 290 refers to "the city" or "a city of the land Urusalim called Bît-Ninip" (Beth-Anušat [?]). As there is no prefix of any kind before the element salim, it is not probable that this is the name of either a man (the city's founder) or a god (like the Assyr Šulmanu). The form in Sennacherib's inscriptions (cf Taylor Cylinder, III, 50), Ursalimmu, gives the whole as a single word in the nominative, the double m implying that the i was long. As the Assyrians pronounced s as sh, it is likely that the Urusalimites did the same, hence the Heb yerûshālaim, with sh. See Jerusalem.

SALEM (Σάλημος, Sálēmos; AV Salum): An ancestor of Ezra (1 Esd 8 1)="Shallum" in Ezr 7 2="Salemas" in 2 Esd 1 1.

SALEMAS, sal′ē-mas, sa-lē′mas (Lat Salame; AV Sadamias): An ancestor of Ezra (2 Esd 1 1)= "Shallum" in Ezr 7 2; called also "Salem" in 1 Esd 8 1.

SALIM, sā′lim (Σαλείμ, Saleím): A place evidently well known, since the position of Aenon, the springs where John was baptizing, was defined by reference to it: they were "near to Salim" (Jn 3 23). It must be sought on the W. of the Jordan, as will be seen from comparison of Jn 1 28; 3 26; 10 40. Many identifications have been proposed: e.g. that of Alford with Shilhim and Ain in the S. of Judah; that of Büsching with ʿAin Kārim, and that of Barclay, who would place Salim in Wâdy Suleim near ʿAnāta, making Aenon the springs in Wâdy Fārʿah. These are all ruled out by their distance from the district where John is known to have been at work. If there were no other objection to that suggested by Conder (Tent Work, 49 f) following Robinson (BR, III, 333) with Sālim in the plain E. of Nāblus, Aenon being ʿAinūn in Wâdy Fārʿah, it would be sufficient to say that this is in the very heart of Samaria, and therefore impossible. In any case the position of Aenon, 6 miles distant, with a high ridge intervening, would hardly be defined by the village of Sālim, with the important city of Shechem quite as near, and more easily accessible. Onom places Aenon 8 Rom miles S. of Scythopolis (Beisān), near Salumias (Sālim) and the Jordan. This points to Tell Ridhghah, on the northern side of which is a shrine known locally as Sheikh Selīm. Not far off, by the ruins of Umm el-ʿAmdān, there are seven copious fountains which might well be called Aenon, "place of springs."

There is reason to believe that this district did not belong to Samaria, but was included in the lands of Scythopolis, which was an important member of the league of ten cities.

SALIMOTH, sal′i-moth (B, Σαλειμώθ, Saleimôth, A, Ἀσσαλιμώθ, ʼAssalimôth; the latter is due to a wrong division of syllables; AV Assalimoth): The same as "Shelomith" (Ezr 8 10). S., the son of Josaphias, of the family of Banias, and with him 130 men went up to Jerus with Ezra (1 Esd 8 36).

SALLAI, sal′ā̇-ī, sal′ī (סַלַּי, ṣallay; Σαλώμ, Salôm, A, Σαλώ, Salô, with variants):

(1) Eponym of a Benjamite family which settled at Jerus after the return, descendants of "Sallu" (1 Ch 9 7; Neh 11 7.8); the pedigrees of Sallu differ decidedly in the two passages. Curtis (ICC) suggests that "son of Hodaviah, the son of Hassenuah" (Ch) is a corruption or derivation of "Judah the son of Hassenuah" (Neh).

(2) Name of a priestly family (Neh 12 20), called "Sallu" in ver 7.

SALLU, sal′ū. See Sallai.

SALLUMUS, sa-lū′mus, sal′ū̇-mus (Σάλλουμος, Sálloumos): One of the porters who had taken "strange wives" (1 Esd 9 25)="Shallum" in Ezr 10 24; called also "Salum" in 1 Esd 5 28.

SALMA, sal′ma. See Salmon.

SALMAI, sal′mī, sal′mā̇-ī (שַׁלְמַי, salmay; AV Shalmai [AV in Neh 7 48 is "Shalmai"=Ezr 2 46]; RV "Salmai"): The eponym of a family of Nethinim, called "Shamlai" in Ezr 2 46 (Kerē, שַׁמְלַי, shamlay, Kethībh, שַׁלְמַי, shalmay, followed by AV text, "Shalmai"; B, Σαμαάν, Samaán, A, Σελαμί, Selamí; Neh 7 48, B, Σαλεμεί, Salemeí, A, Σελμεί, Selmeí, א, Σαμαεί, Samaeí). The name suggests a foreign reign. In 1 Esd 5 30 the corresponding name is "Subai."

SALMANASAR, sal-ma-nā′sar (2 Esd 13 40)= Shalmaneser (q.v.).

SALMON, sal′mon, SALMA (שַׁלְמוֹן, salmōn, "investiture" [Ruth 4 21], שַׂלְמָה, salmāh, "clothing" [Ruth 4 20], שַׂלְמָא, salmāʼ [1 Ch 2 11.51.54]; Σαλμών, Salmōn):

(1) The father of Boaz the husband of Ruth, and thus the grandfather of Jesse, David's father (Ruth 4 20.21). He is mentioned in both the genealogies of Jesus (Mt 1 4.5; Lk 3 32). From Mt 1 5 we learn that he married Rahab, by whom he begat Boaz.

(2) In 1 Ch 2 51 ff, we read of a Salma, "the father of Beth-lehem," a son of Caleb the son of Hur. He is also said to be the father of "the Netophathites, Atroth-beth-joab, and half of the Manahathites, the Zorites," and several "families of scribes." See also Zalmon.

S. F. Hunter

SALMONE, sal-mō′nē (Σαλμώνη, Salmônē): Acts 27 7. See Phoenix.

SALOAS, sal'ō-as (Σαλόας, Salóas; AV Talsus after Lat Thalsas): In 1 Esd 9 22, for "Elasah" of Ezr 10 22.

SALOM, sā'lom (Σαλώμ, Salôm):

(1) The father of Helkias (Bar 1 7). Gr form of "Shallum."

(2) AV=RV "Salu" (1 Macc 2 26).

SALOME, sa-lō'mē (Σαλώμη, Salômē):

(1) One of the holy women who companied with Jesus in Galilee, and ministered to Him (Mk 15 40.41). She was present at the crucifixion (15 40), and was among those who came to the tomb of Jesus on the resurrection morning (16 1.2). Comparison with Mt 27 56 clearly identifies her with the wife of Zebedee. It is she, therefore, whose ambitious request for her sons James and John is recorded in Mt 20 20–24; Mk 10 35–40. From Jn 19 25 many infer that she was a sister of Mary, the mother of Jesus (thus Meyer, Luthardt, Alford); others (as Godet) dispute the inference.

(2) Salome was the name of the daughter of Herodias who danced before Herod, and obtained as reward the head of John the Baptist (Mt 14 3–11; Mk 6 17–28; cf Jos, Ant, XVIII, v, 4). She is not named in the Gospels. James Orr

SALT, sôlt (מֶלַח, melaḥ; ἅλας, hálas, ἅλς, háls): Common salt is considered by most authorities as an essential ingredient of our food. Most people intentionally season their cooking with more or less salt for the sake of palatability. Others depend upon the small quantities which naturally exist in water and many foods to furnish the necessary amount of salt for the body. Either too much salt or the lack of it creates undesirable disturbance in the animal system. Men and animals alike instinctively seek for this substance to supplement or improve their regular diet. The ancients appreciated the value of salt for seasoning food (Job 6 6). So necessary was it that they dignified it by making it a requisite part of sacrifices (Lev 2 13; Ezr 6 9; 7 22; Ezk 43 24; Mk 9 49). In Nu 18 19; 2 Ch 13 5, a "covenant of salt" is mentioned (cf Mk 9 49). This custom of pledging friendship or confirming a compact by eating food containing salt is still retained among Arab.-speaking people. The Arab. word for "salt" and for a "compact" or "treaty" is the same. Doughty in his travels in Arabia appealed more than once to the superstitious belief of the Arabs in the "salt covenant," to save his life. Once an Arab has received in his tent even his worst enemy and has eaten salt (food) with him, he is bound to protect his guest as long as he remains. See Covenant of Salt.

The chief source of salt in Pal is from the extensive deposits near the "sea of salt" (see Dead Sea), where there are literally mountains and valleys of salt (2 S 8 13; 2 K 14 7; 1 Ch 18 12; 2 Ch 25 11). On the seacoast the inhabitants frequently gather the sea salt. They fill the rock crevices with sea water and leave it for the hot summer sun to evaporate. After evaporation the salt crystals can be collected. As salt-gathering is a government monopoly in Turkey, the government sends men to pollute the salt which is being surreptitiously crystallized, so as to make it unfit for eating. Another extensive supply comes from the salt lakes in the Syrian desert E. of Damascus and toward Palmyra. All native salt is more or less bitter, due to the presence of other salts such as magnesium sulphate.

Salt was used not only as a food, but as an antiseptic in medicine. Newborn babes were bathed and salted (Ezk 16 4), a custom still prevailing. The Arabs of the desert consider it so necessary, that in the absence of salt they bathe their infants in camels' urine. Elisha is said to have healed the waters of Jericho by casting a cruse of salt into the spring (2 K 2 20 f). Abimelech sowed the ruins of Shechem with salt to prevent a new city from arising in its place (Jgs 9 45). Lot's wife turned to a pillar of salt (Gen 19 26).

Figurative: Salt is emblematic of loyalty and friendship (see above). A person who has once joined in a "salt covenant" with God and then breaks it is fit only to be cast out (cf Mt 5 13; Mk 9 50). Saltness typified barrenness (Dt 29 23; Jer 17 6). James compares the absurdity of the same mouth giving forth blessings and cursings to the impossibility of a fountain yielding both sweet and salt water (Jas 3 11 f). James A. Patch

SALT, CITY OF (עִיר הַמֶּלַח, 'īr ha-melaḥ; A, αἱ πόλ[ε]ις ἁλῶν, hai pól[e]is halôn): One of the six cities in the wilderness of Judah mentioned between Nibshan and Engedi (Josh 15 62). The site is very uncertain. The large and important Tell el-Milḥ (i.e. "the salt hill"), on the route from Hebron to Akaba, is possible.

SALT, COVENANT OF. See Covenant of Salt.

SALT, PILLAR OF. See Lot; Salt; Siddim; Slime.

SALT SEA. See Dead Sea.

SALT, VALLEY OF (גֵּיא הַמֶּלַח, gē' ha-melaḥ): The scene of battles, firstly, between David or his lieutenant Abishai and the Edomites (2 S 8 13; 1 Ch 18 12; Ps 60, title), and later between Amaziah and these same foes (2 K 14 7; 2 Ch 25 11). It is tempting to connect this "Valley of Salt" with es Sebkhah, the marshy, salt-impregnated plain which extends from the southern end of the Dead Sea to the foot of the cliffs, but in its present condition it is an almost impossible place for a battle of any sort. The ground is so soft and spongy that a wide détour around the edges has to be made by those wishing to get from one side to the other. It is, too, highly probable that in earlier times the whole of this low-lying area was covered by the waters of the Dead Sea. It is far more natural to identify gē' ha-melaḥ with the Wâdy el-Milḥ ("Valley of Salt"), one of the three valleys which unite at Beersheba to form the Wâdy eṣ-Ṣeba'. These valleys, el-Milḥ and eṣ-Ṣeba', together make a natural frontier to Canaan.

SALT-WORT, sôlt'wûrt (מַלּוּחַ, mallū^{a}ḥ, a word connected with melaḥ, "salt," tr^d in LXX ἅλιμος, hálimos; AV mallows): The halimos of the Greeks is the sea orache, Atriplex halimus, a silvery whitish shrub which flourishes upon the shores of the Dead Sea alongside the rutm (see Juniper). Its leaves are oval and somewhat like those of an olive. They have a sour flavor and would never be eaten when better food was obtainable (Job 30 4). The tr "mallows" is due to the apparent similarity of the Heb mallū^{a}ḥ to the Gr μαλάχη, maláchē, which is the Lat malva and Eng. "mallow." Certain species of malva known in Arab., as خبازة, khubbāzeh, are very commonly eaten by the poor of Pal.

SALU, sā'lū (סָלוּא, ṣālū'; LXX B, Σαλμών, Salmôn, A, Σαλώ, Salô; AV has "Salom" in 1 Macc 2 26): A prince and the head of a house of the tribe of Simeon and the father of Zimri who was slain by Phinehas along with the Midianitish woman whom he had brought to the camp of Israel (Nu 25 14; 1 Macc 2 26).

SALUM, sā′lum (Σαλούμ, Saloúm):

(1) The head of one of the families of porters (1 Esd 5 28; om. in B) = "Shallum" in Ezr 2 42; 10 24; Neh 7 45 = "Sallumus" in 1 Esd 9 25.

(2) 1 Esd 8 1 AV = RV "Salem."

SALUTATION, sal-ū̇-tā′shun (ἀσπασμός, aspasmós): A greeting which might be given in person, orally (Lk 1 29.41.44), or in writing, usually at the close of a letter (1 Cor 16 21; Col 4 18; 2 Thess 3 17; cf use of χαίρειν, chaírein, "greeting," "joy" in Jas 1 1). The Pharisaic Jews loved salutations in public places (Mt 23 7; Mk 12 38, AV "greeting," RV "salutation"; Lk 11 43; 20 46). Often these salutations were very elaborate, involving much time in prostrations, embracings, etc. When Jesus therefore sent out the Seventy, He forbade salutation by the way (Lk 10 4), though He ordinarily encouraged proper civilities of this sort (Mt 5 47; 10 12).

LITERATURE

In EV the words "salvation," "save," are not technical theological terms, but denote simply "deliverance," in almost any sense the latter word can have. In systematic theology, however, "salvation" denotes the whole process by which man is delivered from all that would prevent his attaining to the highest good that God has prepared for him. Or, by a transferred sense, "salvation" denotes the actual enjoyment of that good. So, while these technical senses are often associated with the Gr or Heb words tr^{d} "save," etc, yet they are still more often used in connection with other words or represented only by the general sense of a passage. And so a collection of the original terms for "save," etc, is of value only for the student doing minute detailed work, while it is the purpose of the present article to present a general view of the Bib. doctrine of salvation.

1. General

I. In the OT.—(1) As long as revelation had not raised the veil that separates this life from the next, the Israelite thought of his highest good as long life in a prosperous Pal, as described most typically in Dt 28 1–14. But a definite religious idea was present also, for the "land of milk and honey," even under angelic protection, was worthless without access to God (Ex 33 1–4), to know whom gives happiness (Isa 11 9; Hab 2 14; Jer 31 34). Such a concept is normal for most of the OT, but there are several significant enlargements of it. That Israel should receive God's characteristic of righteousness is a part of the ideal (Isa 1 26; 4 3.4; 32 1–8; 33 24; Jer 31 33.34; Ezk 36 25.26; Zec 8; Dnl 9 24; Ps 51 10–12). Good was found in the extension of Israel's good to the surrounding nations (Mic 4 1–4; Isa 2 2–4; 45 5.6; Zec 2 11; 8 22.23; Isa 60; 66 19–21; Zec 14 16.17, etc), even to the extension of the legitimate sacrificial worship to the soil of Egypt (Isa 19 19–22). Pal was insufficient for the enjoyment of God's gifts, and a new heaven and a new earth were to be received (Isa 65 17; 66 22), and a share in the glories was not to be denied even to the dead (Isa 26 19; Dnl 12 2). And, among the people so glorified, God would dwell in person (Isa 60 19.20; Zec 2 10–12). (2) Salvation, then, means deliverance from all that interferes with the enjoyment of these blessings. So it takes countless forms—deliverance from natural plagues, from internal dissensions, from external enemies, or from the subjugation of conquerors (the exile, particularly). As far as enemies constitute the threatening danger, the prayer for deliverance is often based on their evil character (Ps 101, etc). But for the individual all these evils are summed up in the word "death," which was thought to terminate all relation to God and all possibility of enjoying His blessings (Ps 115 17; Isa 38 18, etc). And so "death" became established as the antinomy to "salvation," and in this sense the word has persisted, although the equation "loss of salvation = physical death" has long been transcended. But death and its attendant evils are worked by God's wrath, and so it is from this wrath that salvation is sought (Josh 7 26, etc). And thus, naturally, salvation is from everything that raises that wrath, above all from sin (Ezk 36 25.26, etc).

2. Individualism

(1) At first the "unit of salvation" was the nation (less prominently the family), i.e. a man though righteous could lose salvation through the faults of others. A father could bring a curse on his children (2 S 21 1–14), a king on his subjects (2 S 24), or an unknown sinner could bring guilt on an entire community (Dt 21 1–9). (On the other hand, ten righteous would have saved Sodom [Gen 18 32].) And the principle of personal responsibility was grasped but slowly. It is enunciated partly in Dt 24 16 (cf Jer 31 29.30), definitely in Ezk 14 12–20; 18; 33 1–20, and fairly consistently in the Pss. But even Ezekiel still held that five-and-twenty could defile the whole nation (8 16), and he had not the premises for resolving the problem—that temporal disasters need not mean the loss of salvation. (2) But even when it was realized that a man lost salvation through his own fault, the converse did not follow. Salvation came, not by the man's mere merit, but because the man belonged to a nation peculiarly chosen by God. God had made a covenant with Israel and His fidelity insured salvation: the salvation comes from God because of His promise or (in other words) because of His name. Indeed, the great failing of the people was to trust too blindly to this promise, an attitude denounced continually by the prophets throughout (from, say, Am 3 2 to Mt 3 9). And yet even the prophets admit a real truth in the attitude, for, despite Israel's sins, eventual salvation is certain. Ezk 20 states this baldly: there has been nothing good in Israel and there is nothing good in her at the prophet's own day, but, notwithstanding, God will give her restoration (cf Isa 8 17.18; Jer 32 6–15, etc).

3. Faith

Hence, of the human conditions, whole-hearted trust in God is the most important. (Belief in God is, of course, never argued in the Bible.) Inconsistent with such trust are, for instance, seeking aid from other nations (Isa 30 1–5), putting reliance in human skill (2 Ch 16 12), or forsaking Pal through fear (Jer 42). In Isa 26 20 entire passivity is demanded, and in 2 K 13 19 lukewarmness in executing an apparently meaningless command is rebuked.

4. Moral Law

(1) Next in importance is the attainment of a moral standard, expressed normally in the various codes of the Law. But fulfilment of the letter of the commandment was by no means all that was required. For instance, the Law permitted the selling of a debtor into slavery (Dt 15 12), but the reckless use of the creditor's right is sharply condemned (Neh 5 1–13). The prophets are never weary of giving short formulae that will exclude such supra-legalism and reduce conduct to a pure motive: "Hate the evil, and love the good, and establish justice in the gate" (Am 5 15); "To do justly, and to love kindness, and to walk humbly with thy God" (Mic 6 8). And the chief emphasis on the Law as written is found in the later books, esp. Ps 119 (cf Ps 147 20). (2) Certain breaches of the Law had no pardon, but were visited with death at once, even despite repentance and confession (Josh 7). But for the most part it is promised that repentance will remove the guilt of the sin if the sin be forsaken (Ezk 18) or, in the case of a sin that would not be repeated, if contrition be felt (2 S 12). Suffering played a part in salvation by bringing knowledge of sin to the conscience, the exile being the most important example (Ezk 36 31). But almost always it is assumed that the possibility of keeping the Law is in man's own power, Dt 30 11–14 stating this explicitly, while the Wisdom Books equate virtue with learning. Consequently, an immense advance was made when man felt the need of God's help to keep the Law, the need of the inscription of the Laws on the heart (Jer 31 31–34). So an outlook was opened to a future in which God would make the nation righteous (see references in 1, above).

5. Sacrifices

(1) The acceptance of repentance as expiating past sins was an act of God's mercy. And so His mercy instituted other and additional means of expiation, most notably that of the sacrifices. But a theology of sacrifice is conspicuously absent from the whole OT, for Lev 17 11 is too incidental and too obscure to be any exception. The Christian (or very late Jewish) interpretations of the ritual laws lack all solidity of exegetical foundation, despite their one-time prevalence. Nor is the study of origins of much help for the meaning attached to the rites by the Jews in historic times. General ideas of offering, of self-denial, of propitiation of wrath, and of entering into communion with God assuredly existed. But in the advanced stages of the religion there is no evidence that sacrifices were thought to produce their effect because of any of these things, but solely because God had commanded the sacrifices. (2) Most sins required a sacrifice as part of the act of repentance, although in case of injury done the neighbor, only after reparation had been made. It is not quite true that for conscious sins no sacrifices were appointed, for in Lev 5 1; 6 1–3, sins are included that could not be committed through mere negligence. And so such rules as Nu 15 30.31 must not be construed too rigorously. (3) Sacrifices as means of salvation are taught chiefly by Ezk, while at the rebuilding of the temple (Hag, Zec) and the depression that followed (Mal), they were much in the foreground, but the preëxilic prophets have little to say about their positive value (Jer 7 22 is the nadir). Indeed, in preëxilic times the danger was the exaltation of sacrifice at the expense of morality, esp. with the peace offering, which could be turned into a drunken revel (Am 5 21–24; Isa 22 13; cf Prov 7 14). Attempts were made to "strengthen" the sacrifices to Jeh by the use of ethnic rites (Hos 4 14; Isa 65 1–5), even with the extreme of human sacrifice (Jer 7 31; Ezk 20 26). But insistence on the strict centralization of worship and increasing emphasis laid on the sin and trespass offerings did away with the worst of the abuses. And many of the Pss, esp. 66, 118, give beautiful evidence of the devotion that could be nourished by the sacrificial rites.

6. Ritual Law

Of the other means of salvation the ritual law (not always sharply distinguishable from the moral law) bulks rather large in the legislation, but is not prominent in the prophets. Requisite to salvation was the abstention from certain acts, articles of food, etc, such abstinence seeming to lie at the background of the term "holiness." But a ritual breach was often a matter of moral duty (burying the dead, etc), and, for such breaches, ritual means of purification are provided and the matter dropped. Evidently such things lay rather on the circumference of the religion, even to Ezekiel, with his anxious zeal against the least defilement. The highest ritual point is touched by Zec 14 20.21, where all of Jerus is so holy that not a pot would be unfit to use in the temple (cf Jer 31 38–40). Yet, even with this perfect holiness, sacrifices would still have a place as a means by which the holiness could be increased. Indeed, this more "positive" view of sacrifices was doubtless present from the first.

II. Intermediate Literature.

1. General

—(1) The great change, compared with the earlier period, is that the idea of God had become more transcendent. But this did not necessarily mean an increase in religious value, for there was a corresponding tendency to take God out of relation to the world by an intellectualizing process. This, when combined with the persistence of the older concept of salvation in this life only, resulted in an emptying of the religious instinct and in indifferentism. This tendency is well represented in Eccl, more acutely in Sir, and in NT times it dominated the thought of the Sadducees. On the other hand the expansion of the idea of salvation to correspond with the higher conception of God broke through the limitations of this life and created the new literary form of apocalyptics, represented in the OT esp. by Zec 9–14; Isa 24–27, and above all by Dnl. And in the intermediate literature all shades of thought between the two extremes are represented. But too much emphasis can hardly be laid on the fact that this intermediate teaching is in many regards simply faithful to the OT. Almost anything that can be found in the OT—with the important exception of the note of joyousness of Dt, etc—can be found again here. (2) Of the conceptions of the highest good the lowest is the Epicureanism of Sir. The highest is probably that of 2 Esd 7 91–98 RV: "To behold the face of him whom in their lifetime they served," the last touch of materialism being eliminated. Indeed, real materialism is notably absent in the period, even En 10 17–19 being less exuberant than the fancies of such early Christian writers as Papias. Individualism is generally taken for granted, but that the opposite opinion was by no means dormant, even at a late period, is shown by Mt 3 9. The idea of a special privilege of Israel, however, of course pervades all the literature, Sib Or 5 and Jub being the most exclusive books and the XII Tests. the most broad-hearted. In place of national privilege, though, is sometimes found the still less edifying feature of party privilege (Ps Sol; En 94–105), the most offensive case being the assertion of En 90 6–9 that the (inactive) Israel will be saved by the exertions of the "little lamb" Pharisees, before whom every knee shall bow in the Messianic kingdom.

2. The Law

(1) The conceptions of the moral demands for salvation at times reach a very high level, esp. in the XII Tests. (making every allowance for Christian interpolations). "The spirit of love worketh together with the law of God in long-suffering unto the salvation of men" (Test. Gad 4 7) is hardly unworthy of St. Paul, and even Jub can say, "Let each love his brother in mercy and justice, and let none wish the other evil" (36 8). But the great tendency is to view God's law merely as a series of written statutes, making no demands except those gained from a rigid construing of the letter. In Lk 10 29, "Who is my neighbor?" is a real question—if he is not my neighbor I need not love him! So duties not literally commanded were settled by utilitarian motives, as outside the domain of religion, and the unhealthy phenomenon of works of supererogation made its appearance (Lk 17 10). The writer of Wisd can feel smugly assured of salvation, because idolatry had been abstained from (15 4; contrast St. Paul's polemic in Rom 2). And discussions about "greatest commandments" caused character in its relation to religion to be forgotten. (2) As God's commands were viewed as statutes the distinction between the moral and the ritual was lost, and the ritual law attained enormous and familiar proportions. The beautiful story of Judith is designed chiefly to teach abstinence from ritually unclean food. And the most extreme case is in Jub 6 34–38—all of Israel's woes come from keeping the feasts by the actual moon instead of by a correct (theoretical) moon (!). (3) Where self-complacency ceased and a strong moral sense was present, despair makes its appearance with extraordinary frequency. The period is the period of penitential prayers, with an undercurrent of doubt as to how far mercy can be expected (Three vs 3–22; Pr Man; Bar 3 1–8, etc). "What profit is it unto us, if there be promised us an immortal time, whereas we have done the works that bring death?" (2 Esd 7 119 RV). The vast majority of men are lost (9 16) and must be forgotten (8 55), and Ezra can trust for his own salvation only by a special revelation (7 77 RV). So, evidently, St. Paul's pre-Christian experience was no unique occurrence. (4) Important for the NT background is the extreme lack of prominence of the sacrifices. They are never given a theological interpretation (except in Philo, where they cease to be sacrifices). Indeed, in Sir 35 they are explicitly said to be devotions for the righteous only, apparently prized only as an inheritance from the past and "because of the commandment" (Sir 35 5; yet cf 38 11). When the temple was destroyed and the sacrifices ceased, Judaism went on its way almost unaffected, showing that the sacrifices meant nothing essential to the people. And, even in earlier times, the Essenes rejected sacrifices altogether, without losing thereby their recognition as Jews.

III. The Teaching of Christ.—The Baptist proclaimed authoritatively the near advent of the kingdom of God, preceded by a Messianic judgment that would bring fire for the wicked and the Holy Spirit for the righteous. Simple but incisive moral teaching and warning against trusting in national privileges, with baptism as an outward token of repentance, were to prepare men to face this judgment securely. But we have no data to determine how much farther (if any) the Baptist conceived his teaching to lead.

1. The Baptist

2. Kingdom of God

It was in the full heat of this eschatological revival that the Baptist had fanned, that Christ began to teach, and He also began with the eschatological phrase, "The kingdom of God is at hand." Consequently His teaching must have been taken at once in an eschatological sense, and it is rather futile to attempt to limit such implications to passages where modern eschatological phrases are used unambiguously. "The kingdom of God is at hand" had the inseparable connotation "Judgment is at hand," and in this context, "Repent ye" (Mk 1 15) must mean "lest ye be judged." Hence, Our Lord's teaching about salvation had primarily a future content: positively, admission into the kingdom of God, and negatively, deliverance from the preceding judgment. So the kingdom of God is the "highest good" of Christ's teaching but, with His usual reserve, He has little to say about its externals. Man's nature is to be perfectly adapted to his spiritual environment (see RESURRECTION), and man is to be with Christ (Lk 22 30) and the patriarchs (Mt 8 11). But otherwise—and again as usual—the current descriptions are used without comment, even when they rest on rather materialistic imagery (Lk 22 16.30). Whatever the kingdom is, however, its meaning is most certainly not exhausted by a mere reformation of the present order of material things.

3. Present and Future

But the fate of man at judgment depends on what man is before judgment, so that the practical problem is salvation from the conditions that will bring judgment; i.e. present and future salvation are inseparably connected, and any attempt to make rigid distinctions between the two results in logomachies. Occasionally even Christ speaks of the kingdom of God as present, in the sense that citizens of the future kingdom are living already on this earth (Mt 11 11; Lk 17 21[?]; the meaning of the latter verse is very dubious). Such men are "saved" already (Lk 19 9; 7 50[?]), i.e. such men were delivered from the bad moral condition that was so extended that Satan could be said to hold sway over the world (Lk 10 18; 11 21).

4. Individualism

That the individual was the unit in this deliverance needs no emphasis. Still, the Divine privilege of the Jews was a reality and Christ's normal work was limited to them (Mt 10 5; 15 26, etc). He admitted even that the position of the Jewish religious leaders rested on a real basis (Mt 23 3). But the "good tidings" were so framed that their extension to all men would have been inevitable, even had there not been an explicit command of Christ in this regard. On the other hand, while the message involved in every case strict individual choice, yet the individual who accepted it entered into social relations with the others who had so chosen. So salvation involved admission to a community of service (Mk 9 35, etc). And in the latter part of Christ's ministry, He withdrew from the bulk of His disciples to devote Himself to the training of an inner circle of Twelve, an act explicable only on the assumption that these were to be the leaders of the others after He was taken away. Such passages as Mt 16 18; 18 17 merely corroborate this.

5. Moral Progress

Of the conditions for the individual, the primary (belief in God being taken for granted) was a correct moral ideal. Exclusion from salvation came from the Pharisaic casuistry which had invented limits to righteousness. Ex 20 13 had never contemplated permitting angry thoughts if actual murder was avoided, and so on. In contrast is set the idea of character, of the single eye (Mt 6 22), of the pure heart (5 8). Only so can the spiritual house be built on a rock foundation. But the mere ideal is not enough; persistent effort toward it and a certain amount of progress are demanded imperatively. Only those who have learned to forgive can ask for forgiveness (Mt 6 12; 18 35). They who omit natural works of mercy have no share in the kingdom (25 31–46), for even idle words will be taken into account (12 36), and the most precious possession that interferes with moral progress is to be sacrificed ruthlessly (18 8.9, etc). Men are known by their fruits (7 20); it is he that doeth the will of the Father that shall enter into the kingdom (7 21), and the final ideal—which is likewise the goal—is becoming a son of the Father in moral likeness (5 45). That this progress is due to God's aid is so intimately a part of Christ's teaching on the entire dependence of the soul on God that it receives little explicit mention, but Christ refers even His own miracles to the Father's power (Lk 11 20).

6. Forgiveness

Moral effort, through God's aid, is an indispensable condition for salvation. But complete success in the moral struggle is not at all a condition, in the sense that moral perfection is required. For Christ's disciples, to whom the kingdom is promised (Lk 12 32), the palsied man who receives remission of sins (Mk 2 5), Zacchaeus who is said to have received salvation (Lk 19 9), were far from being models of sinlessness. The element in the character that Christ teaches as making up for the lack of moral perfection is becoming "as a little child" (cf Mk 10 15). Now the point here is not credulousness (for belief is not under discussion), nor is it meekness (for children are notoriously not meek). And it most certainly is not the pure passivity of the newly born infant, for it is gratuitous to assume that only such infants were meant even in Lk 18 15, while in Mt 18 2 (where the child comes in answer to a call) this interpretation is excluded. Now, in the wider teaching of Christ the meaning is made clear enough. Salvation is for the poor in spirit, for those who hunger and thirst after righteousness, for the prodigal knowing his wretchedness. It is for the penitent publican, while the self-satisfied Pharisee is rejected. A sense of need and a desire that God will give are the characteristics. A child does not argue that it has earned its father's benefits but looks to him in a feeling of dependence, with a readiness to do his bidding. So it is the soul that desires all of righteousness, strives toward it, knows that it falls short, and trusts in its Father for the rest, that is the savable soul.

7. Person of Christ

Christ speaks of the pardon of the publican (Lk 18 9 ff) and of the prodigal welcomed by the Father (Lk 15 20), both without intermediary. And it is perhaps not necessary to assume that all of those finding the strait gate (Mt 7 14) were explicitly among Christ's disciples. But would Christ have admitted that anyone who had come to know Him and refused to obey Him would have been saved? To ask this question is to answer it in the negative (Mk 9 40 is irrelevant). Real knowledge of the Father is possible only through the unique knowledge of the Son (Lk 10 21.22), and lack of faith in the Son forfeits all blessings (Mk 6 5.6; 9 23). Faith in Him brings instant forgiveness of sins (Mk 2 5), and love directed to Him is an indisputable sign that forgiveness has taken place (Lk 7 47). But Christ thought of Himself as Messiah and, if the term "Messiah" is not to be emptied of its meaning, this made Him judge of the world (such verses as Mk 8 38 are hardly needed for direct evidence). And, since for Christ's consciousness an earthly judgeship is unthinkable, a transcendental judgeship is the sole alternative, corroborated by the use of the title Son of Man. But passage from simple humanity to the transcendental glory of the Son-of-Man Messiah involved a change hardly expressible except by death and resurrection. And the expectation of death was in Christ's mind from the first, as is seen by Mk 2 18.19 (even without ver 20). That He could have viewed His death as void of significance for human salvation is simply inconceivable, and the ascription of Mk 10 45 to Pauline influence is in defiance of the facts. Nor is it credible that Christ conceived that in the interval between His death and His Parousia He would be out of relation to His own. To Him the unseen world was in the closest relation to the visible world, and His passage into glory would strengthen, not weaken, His power. So there is a complete justification of Mk 14 22–25: to Christ His death had a significance that could be paralleled only by the death of the Covenant victim in Ex 24 6–8, for by it an entirely new relation was established between God and man.

8. Notes

(1) Salvation from physical evil was a very real part, however subordinate, of Christ's teaching (Mk 1 34, etc). (2) Ascetic practices as a necessary element in salvation can hardly claim Christ's authority. It is too often forgotten that the Twelve were not Christ's only disciples. Certainly not all of the hundred and twenty of Acts 1 15 (cf ver 21), nor of the five hundred of 1 Cor 15 6, were converted after the Passion. And they all certainly could not have left their homes to travel with Christ. So the demands made in the special case of the Twelve (still less in such an extremely special case as Mk 10 21) in no way represent Christ's normal practice, whatever readiness for self-sacrifice may have been asked of all. So the representations of Christ as ruthlessly exacting all from everyone are quite unwarranted by the facts. And it is well to remember that it is Mt 11 19 that contains the term of reproach that His adversaries gave Him.

IV. St. Paul.—Instead of laying primal stress on St. Paul's peculiar contributions to soteriology, it will be preferable to start from such Pauline passages as simply continue the explicit teaching of Christ. For it is largely due to the common reversal of this method that the present acute "Jesus-Paulus" controversy exists.

1. General

That St. Paul expected the near advent of the kingdom of God with a judgment preceding, and that salvation meant to him primarily deliverance from this judgment, need not be argued. And, accordingly, emphasis is thrown sometimes on the future deliverance and sometimes on the present conditions for the deliverance (contrast Rom 5 9 and 8 24), but the practical problem is the latter. More explicitly than in Christ's recorded teaching the nature and the blessings of the kingdom are described (see Kingdom of God), but the additional matter is without particular religious import. A certain privilege of the Jews appears (Rom 3 1–8; 9–11), but the practical content of the privilege seems to be eschatological only (11 26). Individual conversion is of course taken for granted, but the life after that becomes highly corporate (see Church).

2. Moral Progress

(1) The moral ideal is distinctly that of character. St. Paul, indeed, is frequently obliged to give directions as to details, but the detailed directions are referred constantly to the underlying principle, Rom 14 or 1 Cor 8 being excellent examples of this, while "love is the fulfilment of the law" (Rom 13 10) is the summary. (2) Persistent moral effort is indispensable, and the new life absolutely must bring forth fruit to God (Rom 6 4; 13 12; Gal 5 24; Col 3 5; Eph 2 3; 4 17.22–32;

Tit 2 11–14). Only by good conduct can one please God (1 Thess 4 1), and the works of even Christians are to be subjected to a searching test (1 Cor 3 13; 4 5; 2 Cor 5 10) in a judgment not to be faced without the most earnest striving (1 Cor 10 12; Phil 2 12), not even by St. Paul himself (1 Cor 9 27; Phil 3 12–14). And the possibility of condemnation because of a lack of moral attainment must not be permitted to leave the mind (1 Cor 3 17; Gal 5 21; cf Rom 8 12.13; 11 20; 1 Cor 10 12; Gal 6 7–9). Consequently, growth in actual righteousness is as vital in St. Paul's soteriology as it is in that teaching of Christ: Christians have "put off the old man with his doings" (Col 3 9).

3. The Spirit

That this growth is God's work is, however, a point where St. Paul has expanded Christ's quiet assumption rather elaborately. In particular, what Christ had made the source of His own supernatural power—the Holy Spirit—is specified as the source of the power of the Christian's ordinary life, as well as of the more special endowments (see Spiritual Gifts). In the Spirit the Christian has received the blessing promised to Abraham (Gal 3 14); by it the deeds of the body can be put to death and all virtues flow into the soul (Gal 5 16–26), if a man walks according to it (1 Cor 6 19.20; 1 Thess 4 8). The palmary passage is Rom 7–8. In ch 7 St. Paul looks back with a shudder on his pre-Christian helplessness (it is naturally the extreme of exegetical perversity to argue that he dreaded not the sin itself but only God's penalty on sin). But the Spirit gives strength to put to death the deeds of the body (8 13), to disregard the things of the flesh (8 5), and to fulfil the ordinance of the Law (8 4). Such moral power is the test of Christianity: as many as are led by the Spirit of God, these are the sons of God (8 14).

4. Mystical Union

This doctrine of the Spirit is simply that what Christ did on earth would be carried on with increased intensity after the Passion. That this work could be thought of out of relation to Christ, or that Christ Himself could have so thought of it (see above, III, 7) is incredible. So the exalted Christ appears as the source of moral and spiritual power (St. Paul speaks even more of Christ's resurrection than of the Passion), the two sources (Christ and the Spirit) being very closely combined in 2 Cor 3 17; Rom 8 9; Gal 4 6. Our old man has been crucified, so putting an end to the bondage of sin, and we can prevent sin from reigning in our mortal bodies, for our burial into Christ's death was to enable us to walk in newness of life (Rom 6 2–14). The resurrection is a source of power, and through Christ's strength all things can be done (Phil 4 13.20). Christ is the real center of the believer's personality (Gal 2 20); the man has become a new creature (2 Cor 5 17; cf Col 2 20; 3 3); we were joined to another that we might bring forth fruit to God (Rom 7 4). And by contact with the glory of the Lord we are transformed into the same image (2 Cor 3 18), the end being conformation to the image of the Son (Rom 8 30).

5. Forgiveness

(1) This growth in actual holiness, then, is fundamental with St. Paul: "If any man hath not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his" (Rom 8 9). And the acquisition of strength through union with Christ is vitally connected with the remission of sins. In Rom 7 1–6 (cf Col 2 11.12), the mystical union with Christ makes His death ours (cf Col 3 3) and so removes us from the Law (cf Rom 10 4; 1 Cor 15 56), which has no relation to the dead. And by the life-giving power of this union the strength of sin is broken (Rom 6 6). (2) The condition in man that makes forgiveness possible St. Paul calls "faith"—a very complicated term. Its chief use, however, is in opposition to "works" (most clearly in Rom 9 30—10 13). The Jews' "pursuit after righteousness"—the attempt to wring salvation from God as wages earned—was vain (Rom 10 13), and in contrast is the appeal to God, the conscious relinquishment of all claim (4 5). The soul looks trustingly for salvation to its Father, precisely the attitude of the "children" in the teaching of Christ. But no more than in the teaching of Christ is faith a purely passive virtue, for man must be "obedient" to it (Rom 1 5; 10 16; 1 Thess 2 13). And for the necessary presence of love in faith cf 1 Cor 13 2; Gal 5 6; Eph 3 17.

6. Atonement

Because of faith—specifically, faith in Christ (except Rom 4; Gal 3 6)—God does not visit the penalties of sins on believers, but treats them as if they were righteous (Rom 5 1, etc). But this is not because of a quality in the believer or in the faith, but because of an act that preceded any act of Christian faith, the death of Christ (not the cross, specifically, for St. Paul does not argue from the cross in all of Rom). Through this death God's mercy could be extended safely, while before this the exercise of that mercy had proved disastrous (Rom 3 25.26). And this death was a sacrifice (Rom 3 25, etc). And it is certain that St. Paul conceived of this sacrifice as existing quite independently of its effect on any human being. But he has given us no data for a really complete sacrificial doctrine, a statement sufficiently proved by the hopeless variance of the interpretations that have been propounded. And that St. Paul ever constructed a theory of the operation of sacrifices must be doubted. There is none in the contemporary Jewish literature, there is none in the OT, and there is none in the rest of the NT, not even in He. Apparently the rites were so familiar that sacrificial terminology was ready to hand and was used without particular reflection and without attempting to give it precise theological content. This is borne out by the ease with which in Rom 3 24.25 St. Paul passes from a ransom (redemption) illustration to a (quite discordant) propitiation illustration. For further discussion see Atonement; Justification. Here it is enough to say that to make a juridical theory constructed from Pauline implications and illustrations central in Christianity is to do exactly what St. Paul did not do.

7. Summary

Summing up, there is a double line of thought in St. Paul: the remission of penalties through the atoning death of Christ and the destruction of the power of sin through strength flowing from Christ, the human element in both cases being faith. The question of the order of the steps is futile, for "to have faith," "to be in Christ," and "to have the Spirit" are convertible terms, i.e. in doctrinal phraseology, the beginnings of sanctification are simultaneous with justification. Attempts to unify the two lines of thought into a single theory cannot claim purely Bib. support. The "ethical" theory, which in its best form makes God's pardon depend on the fact that the sinner will be made holy (at least in the next world), introduces the fewest extraneous elements, but it says something that St. Paul does not say. On the other hand one may feel that considering St. Paul as a whole—to say nothing of the rest of the NT—the pure justification doctrine has bulked a little too large in our dogmatics. God's pardon for sin is an immensely important matter, but still more important is the new power of holiness.

8. Notes

(1) Baptism presents another obstacle to a strict unifying of Pauline theology. A very much stronger sacramentarianism is admitted in St. Paul today than would have been accepted a generation ago, and such passages as Rom 6 1–7; Gal 3 27; Col 2 12 make it certain that he regarded baptism as conferring very real spiritual powers. But that he made a mechanical distinction between the blessings given then and those given at some other time must be doubted. (2) Salvation from the flesh (Rom 7 24) involves no metaphysical dualism, as "flesh" is the whole of the lower nature from which the power to holiness saves a man (8 13). Indeed, the body itself is an object of salvation (Rom 8 11; and see RESURRECTION). (3) Quite in the background lies the idea of salvation from physical evil (2 Cor 1 10, etc). Such evils are real evils (1 Cor 11 30), but in God's hands they may become pure blessings (Rom 5 3; 2 Cor 12 7). (4) Salvation from sin after conversion is due to God's judging the man in terms of the acquired supernatural nature (Rom 8 14, etc). Yet certain sins may destroy the union with Christ altogether (1 Cor 3 17, etc), while others bring God's chastening judgment (1 Cor 11 30–32). Or proper chastisement may be inflicted by St. Paul himself (1 Cor 5 1–5; 1 Tim 1 20) or by the congregation (Gal 6 1; 2 Thess 3 10–15; 2 Cor 2 6).

V. Rest of NT: Summary.—

1. St. John

(1) St. John had the task of presenting Christ to Gentiles, who were as unfamiliar with the technical meaning of such phrases as "kingdom of God" or "Son of Man" as is the world today, and to Gentiles who had instead a series of concepts unknown in Pal. So a "translation of spiritual values" became necessary if the gospel were to make an immediate appeal, a translation accomplished so successfully that the Fourth Gospel has always been the most popular. The Synoptists, esp. the extremely literal St. Mark, imperatively demand a historical commentary, while St. John has successfully avoided this necessity. (2) The "kingdom of God," as a phrase (3 3.5; cf 18 36), is replaced by "eternal life." This life is given in this world to the accepter of Christ's teaching (5 24; 6 47), but its full realization will be in the "many mansions" of the Father's house (14 2), where the believer will be with Christ (17 24). A judgment of all men will precede the establishment of this glorified state (5 28.29), but the believer may face the judgment with equanimity (5 24). So the believer is delivered from a state of things so bad as expressible as a world under Satan's rule (12 31; 14 30; 16 11), a world in darkness (3 19), in ignorance of God (17 25), and in sin (8 21), all expressible in the one word "death" (5 24). (3) The Jews had real privilege in the reception of Christ's message (1 11; 4 22, etc), but the extension of the good tidings to all men was inevitable (12 23.32, etc). Belief in Christ is wholly a personal matter, but the believers enter a community of service (13 14), with the unity of the Father and Son as their ideal (17 21). (4) The nature of the moral ideal, reduced to the single word "love" (13 34; 15 12), is assumed as known and identified with "Christ's words" (5 24; 6 63, etc), and the necessity of progress toward it as sharply pointed as in the Synoptists. The sinner is the servant of sin (8 34), a total change of character is needed (3 6), and the blessing is only on him who does Christ's commandments (13 17). This "doing" is the proof of love toward Christ (14 15. 21); only by bearing fruit and more fruit can discipleship be maintained (15 1–6; cf 14 24), and, indeed, by bearing fruit men actually become Christ's disciples (15 8, Gr). The knowledge of Christ and of God that is eternal life (17 3) comes only through moral effort (7 17). In St. John the contrasts are colored so vividly that it would almost appear as if perfection were demanded. But he does not present even the apostles as models of sanctity (13 38; 16 32), and self-righteousness is condemned without compromise; the crowning sin is to say, "We see" (9 41). It is the Son who frees from sin (8 36), delivers from darkness (8 12; 12 46), and gives eternal life (11 25.26; cf 3 16; 5 24; 6 47). This emphasis on the Divine side of the process is probably the reason for the omission of the terms "repent," "repentance," from the Gospel in favor of "faith" (6 29, esp.), but this "faith" involves in turn human effort, for, without "abiding," faith is useless (8 30.31). (5) An advance on the Synoptists is found in the number of times Christ speaks of His death (3 14.15; 10 11.15; 12 24.32; 17 19) and in the greater emphasis laid on it, but no more than in the Synoptists is there any explanation of how the Atonement became effectual. A real advance consists in the prospect of Christ's work after His death, when, through the Paraclete (7 38.39; 14 16 ff), a hitherto unknown spiritual power would become available for the world. And spiritual power is due not only to a union of will with Christ but to mystical union with Him (15 1–9). See above, III, 7, for the relation of these thoughts to the synoptic teaching.

2. Hebrews

(1) The emphasis of He is of course on the sacrificial work of Christ, but the Ep. makes practically no contribution to the theology of sacrifice. The argument is this: The OT sacrifices certainly had an efficacy; Christ's sacrifice fulfilled their types perfectly, therefore it had a perfect efficacy (9 13.14). This must have been a tremendously potent argument for He's own purpose, but it is of very little help to the modern theologian. (2) More than in St. Paul is emphasized the human training of Christ for His high-priestly work. Since He laid hold of the seed of Abraham (2 16), He learned by experience all that man had to suffer (2 17; 4 15; 5 8, etc). In He the essence of the sacrifice lies not in the death but in what we call the ascension—the presentation of the blood in the heavenly tabernacle (9 11–14; see the comms.). That the death was specifically on the cross (12 2 only) belonged to the stage of training and had no especial significance in the sacrificial scheme. Christ's intercession for us in heaven receives more emphasis than in the rest of the NT (7 25).

3. St. Peter

The one other distinct contribution to NT soteriology is made in 1 Pet's evaluation of the vicarious suffering of the "Servant" of Isa 53. What Christ did through His sufferings we may do in some degree through our sufferings; as His pains helped not only living mankind, but even departed sinners, so we may face persecution more happily with the thought that our pains are benefiting other men (3 16–20). It is hardly possible that St. Peter thought of this comparison as conveying an exhaustive description of the Atonement (cf 1 19), but that the comparison should be made at all is significant.

4. Summary

(1) Salvation is both a present and a future matter for us. The full realization of all that God has in store will not be ours until the end of human history (if, indeed, there will not be opened infinite possibilities of eternal growth), but the enjoyment of these blessings depends on conditions fulfilled in us and by us now. But a foretaste of the blessings of forgiveness of sins and growth in holiness is given on this earth. The pardon depends on the fact of God's mercy through the death of Christ—a fact for religious experience but probably incapable of expression as a complete philosophical dogma.

But strength comes from God through the glorified Christ (or through the Spirit), this vital union with God being a Christian fundamental. These two lines are in large degree independent, and the selection of the proportions profitable to a given soul is the task of the pastor. (2) That human effort is an essential in salvation is not to be denied in the face of all the NT evidence, esp. St. Paul taken as a whole. And yet no one with the faintest conception of what religion means would think of coming before God to claim merit. Here the purely intellectual discussions of the subject and its psychological course in the soul run in different channels, and "anti-synergistic" arguments are really based on attempts to petrify psychological experience into terms of pure dogma. (3) Still more true is this of attempts to describe mathematically the steps in salvation—the ordo salutis of the older dogmatics—for this differs with different souls. In particular, NT data are lacking for the development of the individual born of Christian parents in a Christian country. (4) Further, the social side of salvation is an essentially Christian doctrine and cannot be detached from the corporate life of the Christian church. Salvation from temporal evils is equally, if secondarily, Christian. Nationalism in salvation is at present much in the background. But it is as true today as it was in ancient Israel that the sins of a nation tend to harm the souls of even those who have not participated actively in those sins.

LITERATURE.—The literature of salvation is virtually the literature of theology (see under separate arts., ATONEMENT; JUSTIFICATION; SANCTIFICATION; PERSON OF CHRIST; JOHANNINE THEOLOGY; PAULINE THEOLOGY, etc), but a few recent works may be mentioned. Indispensable are the works of Stevens, The Christian Doctrine of Salvation and The Pauline Theology. Garvie's Romans in the "New Century" series should be used as a supplement to any other comm. on Rom. The juridical theory has as its best defence in Eng. Denney's The Death of Christ. The ethical theory is best presented in the works of Du Bose, The Gospel in the Gospels, The Gospel according to St. Paul, and High-Priesthood and Sacrifice (Sanday's Expos reviews of the two former, reprinted in The Life of Christ in Recent Research, should be read in any case).

SAMARIA, sa-mā'ri-a, CITY OF (שֹׁמְרוֹן, shōm^{e}rōn; Σαμάρεια, Samáreia, Σεμερών, Semerōn, and other forms):

(1) Shechem was the first capital of the Northern Kingdom (1 K 12 25). Jeroboam seems later to have removed the royal residence to Tirzah (14 17). After the brief reigns of Elah and Zimri came that of Omri, who reigned 6 years in Tirzah, then he purchased the hill of Samaria and built a city there, which was thenceforward the metropolis of the kingdom of Israel (16 24). Here the hill and the city are said to have been named after Shemer, the original owner of the land. There is nothing intrinsically improbable in this. It might naturally be derived from shāmar, and the name in the sense of "outlook" would fitly apply to a city in such a commanding position. The residence, it was also the burying-place, of the kings of Israel (1 K 16 28; 22 37; 2 K 10 35; 13 9.13; 14 16).

Toward the western edge of the Ephraimite uplands there is a broad fertile hollow called Wâdy esh-Sha'īr, "valley of barley." From the midst of it rises an oblong hill to a height of over 300 ft., with a level top. The sides are steep, esp. to the S. The greatest length is from E. to W. The surrounding mountains on three sides are much higher, and are well clad with olives and vineyards. To the W. the hills are lower, and from the crest a wide view is obtained over the Plain of Sharon, with the yellow ribbon of sand that marks the coast line, and the white foam on the tumbling billows; while away beyond stretch the blue waters of the Mediterranean. On the eastern end of the hill, surrounded by olive and cactus, is the modern village of Sebasṭiyeh, under which a low neck of land connects the hill with the eastern slopes. The position is one of great charm and beauty; and in days of ancient warfare it was one of remarkable strength. While it was overlooked from three sides, the battlements crowning the steep slopes were too far off to be reached by missiles from the only artillery known in those times—the sling and the catapult. For besiegers to attempt an assault at arms was only to court disaster. The methods adopted by her enemies show that they relied on famine to do their work for them (2 K 6 24 f, etc). Omri displayed excellent taste and good judgment in the choice he made.

Ruins in Samaria.

The city wall can be traced in almost its entire length. Recent excavations conducted by American archaeologists have uncovered the foundations of Omri's palace, with remains of the work of Ahab and of Herod (probably here was Ahab's ivory palace), on the western end of the hill, while on the western slope the gigantic gateway, flanked by massive towers, has been exposed to view.

Under the influence of Jezebel, Samaria naturally became a center of idolatrous worship. Ahab "reared up an altar for Baal in the house of Baal, which he had built in Samaria. And Ahab made the Asherah" (1 K 16 32 f). Jehoram his son put away the pillar of Baal (2 K 3 2), and within the temple Jehu made an end at once of the instruments of idolatry and of the priests (10 19 f). There are many prophetic references to the enormities practised here, and to their inevitable consequences (Isa 8 4; 9 9; 10 9; 28 1 ff; 36 19; Jer 23 13; Ezk 23 4; Hos 7 1; 13 16; Am 3 12; Mic 1 6, etc).

Under pressure of Damascus Omri conceded to the Syrians the right to "make streets in Samaria" (1 K 20 34).

Ben-hadad II besieged the city, but suffered ignominious defeat (20 1–21; Jos, Ant, VIII, xiv, 1 f). Persistent attempts by the Syrians to reach the city in the time of Jehoram were frustrated by Elisha (2 K 6 8 ff; Jos, Ant, IX, iv, 3). At length, however, Ben-hadad again invested the city, and the besieged were reduced to dire straits, in which, urged by famine, scenes of awful horror were enacted (2 K 6 24 ff). A mysterious panic seized the Syrians. Their deserted camp was discovered by despairing lepers who carried the good news to the famished citizens of the plenty to be found there. Probably in the throat of the great western gateway occurred the crush in which the incredulous captain was trampled to death (ch 7; Jos, Ant, IX, iv, 5).

Here the 70 sons of Ahab were slain by Jehu in the general destruction of the house of Ahab (2 K 10 1 ff). In Samaria, the Chronicler tells us, Ahaziah in vain hid from Jehu (2 Ch 22 9; cf 2 K 9 27). Pekah brought hither much spoil from Jerus and many captives, whom, at the instance of the prophet Oded, he released (2 Ch 28 8 ff). The siege of Samaria was begun by Shalmaneser in the 7th year of Hoshea, and the city was finally taken by Sargon II at the end of 3 years, 722 BC (2 K 17 5 f; 18 9 f; Ant, IX, xiv, 1). This marked the downfall of the Northern Kingdom, the people being transported by the conqueror. That this was not done in a thoroughgoing way is evident from the fact recorded in the inscriptions that two years later the country had to be subdued again. Colonists were brought from other parts to take the places of the exiles (2 K 17 24; Ezr 4 10). Alexander the Great took the city in 331 BC, killed many of the inhabitants, and settled others in Shechem, replacing them with a colony of Syro-Macedonians. He gave the adjoining country to the Jews (CAp, II, 4). The city suffered at the hands of Ptolemy Lagi and Demetrius Poliorcetes, but it was still a place of strength (Jos, Ant, XIII, x, 2) when John Hyrcanus came against it in 120 BC. It was taken after a year's siege, and the victor tried to destroy the city utterly. His turning of the water into trenches to undermine the foundations could only refer to the suburbs under the hill. From the only two sources, 'Ain Hārūn and 'Ain Kefr Rīma, to the E. of the town, the water could not rise to the hill. The "many fountains of water" which Benjamin of Tudela says he saw on the top, from which water enough could be got to fill the trenches, are certainly not to be seen today; and they have left no trace behind them. The city was rebuilt by Pompey and, having again fallen under misfortune, was restored by Gabinius (Jos, Ant, XIV, iv, 4; v, 3; BJ, I, vii, 7; viii, 4). To Herod it owed the chief splendor of its later days. He extended, strengthened and adorned it on a scale of great magnificence, calling it Sebaste (=Augusta) in honor of the emperor, a name which survives in the modern Sebasṭiyeh. A temple also was dedicated to Caesar. Its site is probably marked by the impressive flight of steps, with the pedestal on which stood the gigantic statue of Augustus, which recent excavations have revealed. The statue, somewhat mutilated, is also to be seen. Another of Herod's temples W. of the present village was cleared out by the same explorers. The remains of the great double-columned street, which ran round the upper terrace of the hill, bear further testimony to the splendor of this great builder's work (Jos, Ant, XV, vii, 3; viii, 5; BJ, I, xxi, 2). It was here that Herod killed perhaps the only human being whom he ever really loved, his wife Mariamne. Here also his sons perished by his hand (Jos, Ant, XV, vii, 5–7; XVI, iii, 1–3; xi, 7).

It is commonly thought that this city was the scene of Philip's preaching and the events that followed recorded in Acts 8, but the absence of the def. art. in ver 5 makes this doubtful. A Rom colony was settled here by Septimius Severus. From that time little is known of the history of the city; nor do we know to what the final castastrophe was due. It became the seat of a bishopric and was represented in the councils of Nicaea, Constantinople and Chalcedon. Its bishop attended the Synod of Jerus in 536 AD.

The Harvard excavations found the lower walls of the palace of Ahab. Abundant fragments of ivory scattered in the neighborhood probably indicate that this was the ivory palace of that king.

SAMARIA, COUNTRY OF (שֹׁמְרוֹן, shōmᵉrōn; ἡ Σαμαρεῖτις χώρα, hē Samareítis chōra): The name of the city was transferred to the country of which it was the capital, so that Samaria became synonymous with the Northern Kingdom (1 K 13 32; Jer 31 5, etc). The extent of territory covered by this appellation varied greatly at different periods. At first it included the land held by Israel E. of the Jordan, Galilee and Mt. Ephraim, with the northern part of Benjamin. It was shorn of the eastern portion by the conquest of Tiglath-pileser (1 Ch 5 26). Judah probably soon absorbed the territory of Dan in the S. In NT times Samaria had shrunk to still smaller dimensions. Then the country W. of the Jordan was divided into three portions: Judaea in the S., Galilee in the N., and Samaria in the middle. The boundaries are given in general terms by Jos (BJ, III, iii, 1, 4, 5). The southern edge of the Plain of Esdraelon and the lands of Scythopolis, the city of the Decapolis W. of the Jordan, formed the northern boundary. It reached S. as far as the toparchy of Acrabatta (modern 'Aḳrabeh), while on the border between Samaria and Judaea lay the villages of Annath and Borceos, the modern Khirbet 'Aina and Berḳīt, about 15 miles S. of Nāblus. The Jordan of course formed the eastern boundary. On the W. the coast plain as far as Acre belonged to Judaea. The country thus indicated was much more open to approach than the high plateau of Judah with its steep rocky edges and difficult passes. The road from the N. indeed was comparatively easy of defence, following pretty closely the line of the watershed. But the gradual descent of the land to the W. with long, wide valleys, offered inviting avenues from the plain. The great trade routes, that to the fords of Jordan and the E., passing through the cleft in the mountains at Shechem, and those connecting Egypt with the N. and the N.E., traversed Samarian territory, and brought her into constant intercourse with surrounding peoples. The influence of the heathen religions to which she was thus exposed made a swift impression upon her, leading to the corruptions of faith and life that heralded her doom (Jer 23 13; Hos 7 1 ff, etc). The Assyrians came as the scourge of God (2 K 17 5–23). Their attack centered on the capital. Shalmaneser began the siege, and after three years the city fell to Sargon II, his successor. With the fall of Samaria the kingdom came to an end. Following the usual Assyr policy, great numbers of the inhabitants were deported from the conquered country, and their places taken by men brought from "Babylon, and from Cuthah, and from Avva, and from Hamath and Sepharvaim," cities which had already bowed to the Assyr power (ver 24).

It appears from the Assyr inscriptions that the number carried away was 27,290. The number afterward deported from Judah was 200,000, and then the poorest of the land were left to be vinedressers and husbandmen (2 K 25 12). It is evident that a similar policy must have been followed in Samaria, as 27,290 could certainly not include the whole population of the cities and the country. But it would include the higher classes, and esp. the priests from whom the victors would have most to fear. The population therefore after the conquest contained a large proportion of Israelites. It was no doubt among these that Josiah exercised his reforming energy (2 K 23 19 f; 2 Ch 34 6 f). Here also must have been that "remnant of Israel," Manasseh and Ephraim, who contributed for the repair of the house of God (ver 9). These people, left without their religious guides, mingling with the heathen who had brought their gods and, presumably, their priests with them, were apt to be turned from the purity of their faith. A further importation of pagan settlers took place under Esar-haddon and Osnappar (Ezr 4 9.10). The latter is to be identified with Assur-bani-pal. What the proportions of the different elements in the population were, there is now no means of knowing. That there was some intermarriage is probable; but having regard to racial exclusiveness, we may suppose that it was not common. When the Jews deny to them any relation to Israel, and call them Cuthaeans, as if they were the descendants purely of the heathen settlers, the facts just mentioned should be borne in mind.

After the Assyr conquest we are told that the people suffered from lions (2 K 17 25). Jos (Ant, IX, xiv, 3) says "a plague seized upon them." In accordance with the ideas of the time, the strangers thought this due to the anger of the tutelary deity of the land, because they worshipped other gods in his territory, while neglecting him. Ignorant of his special ritual ("manner"), they petitioned the Assyr king, who sent one (Jos says "some") of the priests who had been carried away to teach them "how they should fear the Lord." How much is implied in this "fearing of the Lord" is not clear. They continued at the same time to serve their own gods. There is nothing to show that the Israelites among them fell into their idolatries. The interest of these in the temple at Jerus, the use of which they may now have shared with the Jews, is proved by 2 Ch 34 9. In another place we are told that four score men "from Shechem, from Shiloh, and from Samaria," evidently Israelites, were going up with their offerings to the house of the Lord (Jer 41 5). Once the people of the country are called Samaritans (2 K 17 29). Elsewhere this name has a purely religious significance. See SAMARITANS.

Of the history of Samaria under Assyr and Bab rulers we know nothing. It reappears at the return of the Jews under Pers auspices. The Jews refused the proffered assistance of the Samaritans in rebuilding the temple and the walls of Jerus (Ezr 4 1.3). Highly offended, the latter sought to frustrate the purpose of the Jews (vs 4 ff; Neh 4 7 ff; 1 Esd 2 16 ff). That the Samaritans were accustomed to worship in Jerus is perhaps implied by one phrase in the letter sent to the Pers king: "The Jews that came up from thee are come to us unto Jerus" (Ezr 4 12). Perhaps also they may be referred to in 6 21. Idolatry is not alleged against the "adversaries." We can hardly err if we ascribe the refusal in some degree to the old antagonism between the N. and the S., between Ephraim and Judah. Whatever the cause, it led to a wider estrangement and a deeper bitterness. For the history of the people and their temple on Gerizim, see SAMARITANS.

Samaria, with Pal, fell to Alexander after the battle of Issus. Antiochus the Great gave it to Ptolemy Epiphanes, as the dowry of his daughter Cleopatra (Jos, Ant, XII, iv, 1). John Hyrcanus reduced and desolated the country (Jos, BJ, I, ii, 6 f). After varying fortunes Samaria became part of the kingdom of Herod, at whose death it was given to Archelaus (Jos, Ant, XVII, xi, 4; BJ, II, vi, 3). When Archelaus was banished it was joined to the Rom province of Syria (Jos, Ant, XVII, xiii, 5; BJ, II, viii, 1).

Samaria is a country beautifully diversified with mountain and hill, valley and plain. The olive grows plentifully, and other fruit trees abound. There is much excellent soil, and fine crops of barley and wheat are reaped annually. The vine also is largely cultivated on the hill slopes. Remains of ancient forests are found in parts. As Jos said, it is not naturally watered by many rivers, but derives its chief moisture from rain water, of which there is no lack (BJ, III, iii, 4). He speaks also of the excellent grass, by reason of which the cows yield more milk than those in any other place.

There is a good road connecting Nāblus with Jaffa; and by a road not quite so good, it is now possible to drive a carriage from Jerus to Nazareth, passing through Samaria. W. EWING

SAMARITAN, sa-mar′i-tan, PENTATEUCH, THE. See PENTATEUCH, THE SAMARITAN.

SAMARITANS, sa-mar′i-tanz (שֹׁמְרֹנִים, shōm^{e}rōnīm; Σαμαρεῖται, Samareítai, NT Σαμαρίτης [sing.], Samarítēs): The name "Samaritans" in 2 K 17 29 clearly applies to the Israelitish inhabitants of the Northern Kingdom. In subsequent history it denotes a people of mixed origin, composed of the peoples brought by the conqueror from Babylon and elsewhere to take the places of the expatriated Israelites and those who were left in the land (722 BC). Sargon claims to have carried away only 27,290 of the inhabitants (KIB, II, 55). Doubtless these were, as in the case of Judah, the chief men, men of wealth and influence, including all the priests, the humbler classes being left to till the land, tend the vineyards, etc. Hezekiah, who came to the throne of Judah probably in 715 BC, could still appeal to the tribes of Ephraim, Manasseh, Issachar, Asher and Zebulun (2 Ch 30 5.10.11. 18 ff); and the presence of these tribesmen is implied in the narrative of Josiah's reformation (34 6 f). Although the number of the colonists was increased by Esar-haddon and Osnappar (Assur-bani-pal, Ezr 4 2.9 f), the population, it is reasonable to suppose, continued prevailingly Israelite; otherwise their religion would not so easily have won the leading place. The colonists thought it necessary for their own safety to acknowledge Jeh, in whose land they dwelt, as one among the gods to be feared (2 K 17 24 ff). In the intermixture that followed "their own gods" seem to have fallen on evil days; and when the Samaritans asked permission to share in building the temple under Zerubbabel, they claimed, apparently with a good conscience, to serve God and to sacrifice to Him as the Jews did (Ezr 4 1 f). Whatever justification there was for this claim, their proffered friendship was turned to deadly hostility by the blunt refusal of their request. The old enmity between north and south no doubt intensified the quarrel, and the antagonism of Jew and Samaritan, in its bitterness, was destined to pass into a proverb. The Samaritans set themselves, with great temporary success, to frustrate the work in which they were not permitted to share (Ezr 4 4 ff; Neh 4 7 ff, etc).

From the strict administration of the Law in Jerus malcontents found their way to the freer atmosphere of Samaria. Among these renegades was Manasseh, brother of the high priest, who had married a daughter of Sanballat, the Pers governor of Samaria. According to Jos, Sanballat, with the sanction of Alexander the Great, built a temple for the Samaritans on Mt. Gerizim, of which Manasseh became high priest (Ant, XI, vii, 2; viii, 2 ff). Jos, however, places Manasseh a century too late. He was a contemporary of Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh 13 28).

When it suited their purpose the Samaritans claimed relationship with the Jews, asserting that their roll of the Pent was the only authentic copy (see Pentateuch, The Samaritan); they were equally ready to deny all connection in times of stress, and even to dedicate their temple to a heathen deity (Jos, Ant, XII, v, 5). In 128 BC, John Hyrcanus destroyed the temple (XIII, ix, 1). In the time of Christ the Samaritans were ruled by procurators under the Rom governor of Syria. Lapse of years brought no lessening of the hatred between Jews and Samaritans (Ant, XX, vi, 1). To avoid insult and injury at the hands of the latter, Jews from Galilee were accustomed to reach the feasts at Jerus by way of Peraea. "Thou art a Samaritan, and hast a demon" was an expression of opprobrium (Jn 8 48). Although Jesus forbade the Twelve to go into any city of the Samaritans (Mt 10 5), the parable of the Good Samaritan shows that His love overleaped the boundaries of national hatred (Lk 10 30 ff; cf 17 16; Jn 4 9).

During the Jewish war Cerealis treated the Samaritans with great severity. On one occasion (67 AD) he slaughtered 11,600 on Mt. Gerizim. For some centuries they were found in considerable numbers throughout the empire, east and west, with their synagogues. They were noted as "bankers" and money-changers. For their anti-Christian attitude and conduct Justinian inflicted terrible vengeance on them. From this the race seems never to have recovered. Gradually dwindling, they now form a small community in Nāblus of not more than 200 souls. Their great treasure is their ancient copy of the Law. See Samaria.

Literature.—The best account of the Samaritans is Mills, Nāblus and the Modern Samaritans (Murray, London); cf Montgomery, The Samaritans (1907). A good recent description by Rev. J. E. H. Thomson, D.D., of the Passover celebrated annually on Mt. Gerizim will be found in PEFS, 1902, 82 ff.

SAMATUS, sam'a-tus (Σάματος, Sámatos): One of the sons of Ezora who put away their "strange wives" (1 Esd 9 34). It is difficult to say which, if any, name it represents in ‖ Ezr 10 34 ff, where no "sons of Ezora" are inserted between "sons of Bani" and "sons of Nebo": probably Shallum (ver 42), but possibly Shemariah (ver 41).

SAMECH, sam'ek (ס, ṣamekh): The 15th letter of the Heb alphabet; transliterated in this Encyclopaedia as ṣ. It came to be used for the number 60. For name, etc, see Alphabet.

SAMEIUS, sa-mē'yus: AV=RV Sameus (q.v.).

SAMELLIUS, sa-mel'i-us (B, Σαμέλλιος, Saméllios, A, Σεβέλλιος, Sebéllios, al Σεμέλλιος, Seméllios; AV Semellius): "S. the scribe," one of those who wrote a letter of protest to Artaxerxes against the building of Jerus by the returned exiles (1 Esd 2 16.17.25.30) = "Shimshai" in Ezr 4 8.

SAMEUS, sa-mē'us (A and Fritzsche, Σαμαῖος, Samaíos, B, Θαμαῖος, Thamaíos; AV Sameius): One of the sons of Emmer who put away their "strange wives" (1 Esd 9 21) = "Shemaiah" (RVm "Maaseiah") of the sons of Harim in Ezr 10 21.

SAMGAR-NEBO, sam-gär-nē'bō (סַמְגַּר נְבוֹ, ṣamgar nᵉbhō, a Bab name): An officer of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, who, according to the MT of Jer 39 3, took his seat with other nobles in the middle gate of Jerus after the Chaldaean army had taken the city. Schrader (COT, ii, 109) holds that the name is a Hebraized form of the Assyr Sumgirnabu ("be gracious, Nebo"), but Giesebrecht (Comm., 211) conjectures for Samgar a corruption of Sar-mag (sar-magh), equivalent to Rab-mag (rab-magh), which implies virtual dittography. The number of variant readings exhibited by the LXX seems to confirm the belief that the text is corrupt. Nebo (nabu) is there joined with the following Sarsechim to agree with Nebushazban of ver 13. If the name Samgar-nebo is correct, the first Nergal-sharezer should perhaps be dropped; we would then read: "Samgar-nebo the Sarsechim, Nebushazban the Rab-saris [cf ver 13] and Nergal-sharezer the Rab-mag" (Sayce). See Rab-mag; Rab-saris.

SAMI, sā'mī: AV=RV Sabi (q.v.).

SAMIS, sā'mis: AV=RV Someis (q.v.).

SAMLAH, sam'la (שַׂמְלָה, samlāh; Σαλαμά, Salamá): One of the kings of Edom, of the city of Masrekah. He reigned before the Israelites had kings (Gen 36 36.37; 1 Ch 1 47.48). The fact that the city is mentioned in connection with the name of the king suggests that Edom was a confederacy at this time and the chief city was the metropolis of the whole country.

SAMMUS, sam'us (A, Σαμμοῦς, Sammoús, B, Σαμμού, Sammoú): One of those who stood on Ezra's right hand as he expounded the Law (1 Esd 9 43) = "Shema" in Neh 8 4.

SAMOS, sā'mos (Σάμος, Sámos, "height," "mountain" [see Strabo 346, 457]): One of the most famous of the Ionian islands, third in size among the group which includes Lesbos, Chios (q.v.) and Cos (q.v.). It is situated at the mouth of the bay of Ephesus, between the cities of Ephesus and Miletus (q.v.), and separated from the mainland of Ionia by the narrow strait where the Greeks met and conquered the Pers fleet in the battle of Mycale, 479 BC (Herod. ix.100 ff). The surface of the island is very rugged and mountainous, Mt. Kerki (modern name) rising to a height of 4,700 ft., and it was due to this that the island received its name (see above; see also Samothrace).

Samos was renowned in antiquity as one of the noted centers of Ionian luxury, and reached its zenith of prosperity under the rule of the famous tyrant Polycrates (533–522 BC), who made himself master of the Aegean Sea. He carried on trade with Egypt, and his intercourse with that country, his friendship with Amasis, the famous "ring" story and the revolting manner of the death of Polycrates are all told in one of the most interesting stories of Herodotus (Herod. iii.39 ff).

In 84 BC, the island was joined to the province of Asia, and in 17 BC it became a civitas libera, through the favor of Augustus (Dio Cass. liv.9; Pliny, NH, v.37). Both Marcus Agrippa and Herod visited the island; and according to Jos (Ant, XVI, ii, 2; BJ, I, xxi, 11) "bestowed a great many benefits" on it. In the Apoc, Samos is mentioned among the places to which Lucius, consul of the Romans, wrote, asking their good will toward the Jews (1 Macc 15 23).

In the NT, Paul touched here, after passing Chios (q.v.), on his return from his third missionary journey (Acts 20 15). In TR, we find in this passage καὶ μεἰναντες ἐν Τρωγυλλίῳ, kaí meínantes en Trōgulliō ("and having remained in Trogyllium"). This reading is wanting in the oldest MSS, and may be a sort of gloss, or explanation, due to the technical use of parabállein, "to touch land" (cf Jos, Ant, XVIII, vi, 4), and not necessarily "to make a landing." Trogyllium lay on the mainland opposite Samos, at the end of the ridge of Mycale. Still there is no particular reason why this reading should be supported, esp. as it is not found in the earliest of authorities. Soden's 1913 text, however, retains the reading in brackets.

Literature.—Tozer, Islands of the Aegean (1890). Herodotus and Pausanias have rather full accounts of Samos, and Enc Brit (11th ed) gives a good bibliography of works both ancient and modern.

SAMOTHRACE, sam′ō-thrās (Σαμοθρᾴκη, Samothrákē, "the Thracian Samos"; AV Samothracia, sam-ō-thrā′sha; the island was formerly Dardania; for change of name see Pausanias vii.4,3; Strabo x.457, and for a full discussion Conze, Hauser and Benndorf, Neue Untersuchungen auf S., 1880): An island in the Aegean Sea, S. of Thrace opposite the mouth of the Hebrus River, and N.W. of Troas. The island is mountainous, as the name indicates (see Samos), and towers above Imbros when viewed from the Trojan coast. The summit is about a mile high. It is mentioned in the Iliad (xiii.12) as the seat of Poseidon and referred to by Virgil Aeneid vii.208.

The island was always famous for sanctity, and the seat of a cult of the Cabeiri, which Herodotus (ii.51) says was derived from the Pelasgian inhabitants (see also Aristophanes, Pax 277). The mysteries connected with the worship of these gods later rivaled the famous mysteries of Eleusis, and both Philip of Macedon and Olympias his wife were initiated here (Plut. Alex. 3).

Probably because of its sacred character the island did not figure to any extent in history, but in the expedition of Xerxes in 480 BC, one ship at least of the Samothracian contingent is mentioned as conspicuous in the battle of Salamis.

The famous "Victory of Samothrace" (now in the Louvre) was set up here by Demetrius Poliorcetes c 300 BC, and was discovered in 1863. Since that time (1873–75), the Austrian government carried on extensive excavations (see Conze, Hauser and Benndorf, op. cit.).

In the NT the island is mentioned in Acts 16 11. From Troas, Paul made a straight run to Samothrace, and the next day sailed to Neapolis (q.v.) on the Thracian coast, the port of Philippi (q.v.). At the northern end of S. was a town where the ship could anchor for the night, and on the return journey (Acts 20 6) a landing may have been made, but no details are given. Pliny characterizes the island as being most difficult for anchorage, but because of the hazards of sailing by night, the ancient navigators always anchored somewhere if possible.

SAMPSAMES, samp′sa-mēz (Σαμψάμης, Sampsámēs): A place mentioned in 1 Macc 15 23, usually identified with Samsun, on the coast of the Black Sea. Vulg, with RVm, has "Lampsacus."

SAMSON, sam′sun (שִׁמְשׁוֹן, shimshōn, derived probably from שֶׁמֶשׁ, shemesh, "sun," with the diminutive ending וֹן-, -ōn, meaning "little sun" or "sunny," or perhaps "sun-man"; Σαμψών, Sampsṓn; Lat and Eng. Samson):

1. Name

His home was near Beth-shemesh, which means "house of the sun." Compare the similar formation שִׁמְשַׁי, shimshay (Ezr 4 8.9.17.23).

2. Character

Samson was a judge, perhaps the last before Samuel. He was a Nazirite of the tribe of Dan (Jgs 13 5); a man of prodigious strength, a giant and a gymnast—the Heb Hercules, a strange champion for Jeh! He intensely hated the Philis who had oppressed Israel some 40 years (13 1), and was willing to fight them alone. He seems to have been actuated by little less than personal vengeance, yet in the NT he is named among the heroes of faith (He 11 32), and was in no ordinary sense an OT worthy. He was good-natured, sarcastic, full of humor, and fought with his wits as well as with his fists. Milton has graphically portrayed his character in his dramatic poem Samson Agonistes (1671), on which Handel built his oratorio Samson (1743).

3. Story of His Life

The story of S.'s life is unique among the biographies of the OT. It is related in Jgs 13–16. Like Isaac, Samuel and John the Baptist, he was a child of prayer (13 8.12). To Manoah's wife the angel of Jeh appeared twice (13 3.9), directing that the child which should be born to them should be a Nazirite from the womb, and that he would "begin to save Israel out of the hand of the Philis" (13 5.7.14). The spirit of Jeh first began to move him in Mahaneh-dan, between Zorah and Eshtaol (13 25). On his arriving at manhood, five remarkable circumstances are recorded of him.

(1) His marriage with a Phili woman of Timnah (ch 14). His parents objected to the alliance (14 3), but S.'s motive in marrying her was that he "sought an occasion against the Philis." At the wedding feast S. propounded to his guests a riddle, wagering that if they guessed its answer he would give them 30 changes of raiment. Dr. Moore felicitously renders the text of the riddle thus:

'Out of the eater came something to eat,
And out of the strong came something sweet' (14 14).

The Philis threatened the life of his bride, and she in turn wrung from S. the answer; whereupon he retorted (in Dr. Moore's version):

'If with my heifer ye did not plough,
Ye had not found out my riddle, I trow' (14 18).

Accordingly, in revenge, S. went down to Ashkelon, slew some 30 men, and paid his debt; he even went home without his wife, and her father to save her from shame gave her to S.'s "best man" (14 20). It has been suggested by W. R. Smith (Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia, 70–76) that S. did not from the first intend to take his bride to his home, his marriage being what is known among the Arabs as a çadīḳat, or gift marriage, by which is meant that the husband becomes a part of the wife's tribe. This assumes that the social relations of the Hebrews at that time were matriarchate, the wife remaining with her family, of which custom there are other traces in the OT, the husband merely visiting the wife from time to time. But this is not so obvious in S.'s case in view of his pique (14 19), and esp. in view of his parents' objection to his marrying outside of Israel (14 3). Not knowing that his bride had been given by her father to his friend, S. went down to Timnah to visit her, with a kid; when he discovered, however, that he had been taken advantage of, he went out and caught 300 jackals, and putting firebrands between every two tails, he burned up the grain fields and olive yards of the Philis. The Philis, however, showed they could play with fire, too, and burned his wife and her father. Thereupon, S.

smote the Philis in revenge, "hip and thigh" (15 1–8).

(2) When he escaped to Etam, an almost vertical rock cliff in Judah (by some identified with 'Araq Ismain) not far from Zorah, S.'s home, the Philis invaded Judah, encamped at Lehi above Etam, and demanded the surrender of their arch-enemy. The men of Judah were willing to hand S. over to the Philis, and accordingly went down to the cliff Etam, bound S. and brought him up where the Philis were encamped (15 9–13). When S. came to Lehi the Philis shouted as they met him, whereupon the spirit of Jeh came mightily upon him, so that he broke loose from the two new ropes with which the 3,000 men of Judah had bound him, and seizing a fresh jawbone of an ass he smote with it 1,000 men of the Philis, boasting as he did so in pun-like poetry, 'With the jawbone of an ass, m-ass upon m-ass'; or, as Dr. Moore translates the passage, 'With the bone of an ass, I ass-ailed my ass-ailants' (15 16). At the same time, S. reverently gave Jeh the glory of his victory (15 18). S. being thirsty, Jeh provided water for him at a place called En-hakkore, or "Partridge Spring," or "the Spring of the Caller"—another name for partridge (15 17–19).

(3) S. next went down to Gaza, to the very stronghold of the Philis, their chief city. There he saw a harlot, and, his passions not being under control, he went in unto her. It was soon noised about that S., the Heb giant, was in the city. Accordingly, the Philis laid wait for him. But S. arose at midnight and laid hold of the doors of the gate and their two posts, and carried them a full quarter of a mile up to the top of the mountain that looketh toward Hebron (16 1–3).

(4) From Gaza S. betook himself to the valley of Sorek where he fell in love with another Phili woman, named Delilah, through whose machinations he lost his spiritual power. The Phili lords bribed her with a very large sum to deliver him into their hands. Three times S. deceived her as to the secret of his strength, but at last he explains that he is a Nazirite, and that his hair, which has never been shorn, is the secret of his wonderful power. J. G. Frazer (Golden Bough, III, 390 ff) has shown that the belief that some mysterious power resides in the hair is still widespread among savage peoples, e.g. the Fiji Islanders. Thus S. fell. By disclosing to Delilah this secret, he broke his covenant vow, and the Spirit of God departed from him (16 4–20). The Philis laid hold on him, put out his eyes, brought him down to Gaza, bound him with fetters, and forced him to grind in the prison house. Grinding was women's work! It is at this point that Milton catches the picture and writes,

> "Eyeless in Gaza, at the mill with slaves."

Howbeit, the hair of his head began to grow again; but his eyes did not! (16 21.22).

(5) The final incident recorded of S. is in connection with a great sacrificial feast which the Phili lords gave in honor of Dagon, their god. In their joyous celebration they sang in rustic rhythm:

> 'Our god has given us into our hand
> The foe of our land,
> Whom even our most powerful band
> Was never able to withstand' (16 24).

This song was accompanied probably, as Mr. Macalister suggests, by hand-clapping (Gezer, 129). When they became still more merry, they called for S. to play the buffoon, and by his pranks to entertain the assembled multitude. The house of Dagon was full of people; about 3,000 were upon the roof beholding as S. made sport. With the new growth of his hair his strength had returned to him. The dismantled giant longed to be avenged on his adversaries for at least one of his two eyes (16 28). He prayed, and Jeh heard his prayer. Guided by his attendant, he took hold of the wooden posts of the two middle pillars upon which the portico of the house rested, and slipping them off their pedestals, the house fell upon the lords and upon all the people that were therein. "So the dead that he slew at his death were more than they that he slew in his life" (16 29.30). His kinsmen came and carried him up and buried him near his boyhood home, between Zorah and Eshtaol, in the family burying-ground of his father. "And he judged Israel twenty years" (16 31).

4. Historical Value

The story of Samson is a faithful mirror of his times: "Every man did that which was right in his own eyes" (17 6; 21 25). There was no king in those days, i.e. no central government. Each tribe was separately occupied driving out their individual enemies. For 40 years the Philis had oppressed S.'s tribal compatriots. Their suzerainty was also recognized by Judah (14 4; 15 11). S. was the hero of his tribe. The general historicity of his story cannot be impeached on the mere ground of improbability. His deeds were those which would most naturally be expected from a giant, filled with a sense of justice. He received the local popularity which a man of extraordinary prowess would naturally be given. All peoples glory in their heroes. The theory that the record in Jgs 13–16 is based upon some "solar myth" is now generally abandoned. That there are incidents in his career which are difficult to explain, is freely granted. For example, that he killed a lion (14 6) is not without a parallel; David and Benaiah did the same (1 S 17 34–36; 2 S 23 20). God always inspires a man in the line of his natural endowments. That God miraculously supplied his thirst (15 19) is no more marvelous than what God did for Hagar in the wilderness (Gen 21 19). That S. carried off the doors of the gate of Gaza and their two posts, bar and all, must not confound us till we know more definitely their size and the distance from Gaza of the hill to which he carried them. The fact that he pulled down the roof on which there were 3,000 men and women is not at all impossible, as Mr. Macalister has shown. If we suppose that there was an immense portico to the temple of Dagon, as is quite possible, which was supported by two main pillars of wood resting on bases of stone, like the cedar pillars of Solomon's house (1 K 7 2), all that S., therefore, necessarily did, was to push the wooden beams so that their feet would slide over the stone base on which they rested, and the whole portico would collapse. Moreover, it is not said that the whole of the 3,000 on the roof were destroyed (16 30). Many of those in the temple proper probably perished in the number (R. A. S. Macalister, Bible Side-Lights from the Mound of Gezer, 1906, 127–38).

5. Religious Value

Not a few important and suggestive lessons are deducible from the hero's life: (1) S. was the object of parental solicitude from even before his birth. One of the most suggestive and beautiful prayers in the OT is that of Manoah for guidance in the training of his yet unborn child (13 8). Whatever our estimate of his personality is, S. was closely linked to the covenant. (2) He was endowed with the Spirit of Jeh—the spirit of personal patriotism, the spirit of vengeance upon a foe of 40 years' standing (13 1.25; 14 6 19; 15 14). (3) He also prayed, and Jeh answered him, though in judgment (16 30). But he was prodigal of his strength. S. had spiritual power and performed feats which an ordinary man would hardly perform. But he was unconscious of his high vocation. In a moment of weakness he yielded to Delilah and divulged the secret of his strength. He was careless of his personal endowment. He did not realize that physical endowments no less than spiritual are gifts from God, and that to retain them we must be obedient. (4) He was passionate and therefore weak. The animal of his nature was never curbed, but rather ran unchained and free. He was given to sudden fury. S. was a wild, self-willed man. Passion ruled. He could not resist the blandishments of women. In short, he was an overgrown schoolboy, without self-mastery. (5) He accordingly wrought no permanent deliverance for Israel; he lacked the spirit of coöperation. He undertook a task far too great for even a giant single-handed. Yet, it must be allowed that S. paved the way for Saul and David. He began the deliverance of Israel from the Philis. He must, therefore, be judged according to his times. In his days there was unrestrained individual independence on every side, each one doing as he pleased. S. differed from his contemporaries in that he was a hero of faith (He 11 32). He was a Nazirite, and therefore dedicated to God. He was given to revenge, yet he was ready to sacrifice himself in order that his own and his people's enemies might be overthrown. He was willing to lay down his own life for the sake of his fellow-tribesmen—not to save his enemies, however, but to kill them. (Cf Mt 5 43 f; Rom 5 10.)

SAMUEL, sam'ū-el (שְׁמוּאֵל, shᵉmū'ēl; Σαμουήλ, Samouḗl): The word "Samuel" signifies "name of God," or "his name is El" (God). Other interpretations of the name that have been offered are almost certainly mistaken. The play upon the name in 1 S 1 20 is not intended of course to be an explanation of its meaning, but is similar to the play upon the name Moses in Ex 2 10 and frequently elsewhere in similar instances. Thus by the addition of a few letters shᵉmū'ēl becomes shā'ūl mē'ēl (שָׁאוּל מֵאֵל, שמואל), "asked of God," and recalls to the mother of Samuel the circumstances of the Divine gift to her of a son. Outside of the 1st Book of S the name of the great judge and prophet is found in Jer 15 1; Ps 99 6 and in 1 and 2 Ch. The reference in Jer seems intended to convey the same impression that is given by the narrative of 1 S, that in some sense Samuel had come to be regarded as a second Moses, upon whom the mantle of the latter had fallen, and who had been once again the deliverer and guide of the people at a great national crisis.

1. Sources and Character of the History

The narrative of the events of the life of Samuel appears to be derived from more than one source (see Samuel, Books of). The narrator had before him and made use of biographies and traditions, which he combined into a single consecutive history. The completed picture of the prophet's position and character which is thus presented is on the whole harmonious and consistent, and gives a very high impression of his piety and loyalty to Jeh, and of the wide influence for good which he exerted. There are divergences apparent in detail and standpoint between the sources or traditions, some of which may probably be due merely to misunderstanding of the true nature of the events recorded, or to the failure of the modern reader rightly to appreciate the exact circumstances and time. The greater part of the narrative of the life of Samuel, however, appears to have a single origin.

2. Life

In the portion of the general history of Israel contained in 1 S are narrated the circumstances of the future prophet's birth (ch 1); of his childhood and of the custom of his parents to make annual visits to the sanctuary at Shiloh (2 11.18–21.26); of his vision, and the universal recognition of him as a prophet enjoying the special favor of Jeh (3—4 1). The narrative is then interrupted to describe the conflicts with the Philis, the fate of Eli and his sons, and the capture of the ark of God. It is only after the return of the ark, and apparently at the close of the 20 years during which it was retained at Kiriath-jearim, that Samuel again comes forward publicly, exhorting the people to repentance and promising them deliverance from the Philis. A summary narrative is then given of the summoning of a national council at Mizpah, at which Samuel "judged the children of Israel," and offered sacrifice to the Lord, and of Jeh's response in a great thunderstorm, which led to the defeat and panic-stricken flight of the Philis. Then follows the narrative of the erection of a commemorative stone or pillar, Eben-ezer, "the stone of help," and the recovery of the Israelite cities which the Philis had captured (7 5–14). The narrator adds that the Philis came no more within the border of Israel all the days of Samuel (7 13); perhaps with an intentional reference to the troubles and disasters of which this people was the cause in the time of Saul. A brief general statement is appended of Samuel's practice as a judge of going on annual circuit through the land, and of his home at Ramah (7 15–17).

No indication is given of the length of time occupied by these events. At their close, however, Samuel was an old man, and his sons who had been appointed judges in his place or to help him in his office proved themselves unworthy (8 1–3). The elders of the people therefore came to Samuel demanding the appointment of a king who should be his successor, and should judge in his stead. The request was regarded by the prophet as an act of disloyalty to Jeh, but his protest was overruled by Divine direction, and at Samuel's bidding the people dispersed (8 4–22).

At this point the course of the narrative is again interrupted to describe the family and origin of Saul, his personal appearance, and the search for the lost asses of his father (9 1–5); his meeting with Samuel in a city in the land of Zuph, in or on the border of the territory of Benjamin (Zuph is the name of an ancestor of Elkanah, the father of Samuel, in 1 S 1 1), a meeting of which Samuel had received Divine pre-intimation (9 15 f); the honorable place given to Saul at the feast; his anointing by Samuel as ruler of Israel, together with the announcement of three "signs," which should be to Saul assurances of the reality of his appointment and destiny; the spirit of prophecy which took possession of the future king, whereby is explained a proverbial saying which classed Saul among the prophets; and his silence with regard to what had passed between himself and Samuel on the subject of the kingdom (9 6—10 16).

It is usually, and probably rightly, believed that the narrative of these last incidents is derived from a different source from that of the preceding chapters. Slight differences of inconsistency or disagreement lie on the surface. Samuel's home is not at Ramah, but a nameless city in the land of Zuph, where he is priest of the high place, with a local but, as far as the narrative goes, not a national influence or reputation; and it is anticipated that he will require the customary present at the hands of his visitors (9 6–8). He is described, moreover, not as a judge, nor does he discharge judicial functions, but expressly as a "seer," a name said to be an earlier title equivalent to the later "prophet" (9 9.11.19). Apart, however, from the apparently different position which Samuel occupies, the tone and style of the narrative is altogether distinct from that of the preceding chapters. It suggests, both in its form and in the religious conceptions which are assumed or implied, an older and less elaborated tradition than that which has found expression in the greater part of the book; and it seems to regard events as it were from a more primitive standpoint than the highly religious and monotheistic view of the later accounts. Its value as a witness to history is not impaired, but perhaps rather enhanced by its separate and independent position. The writer or compiler of 1 S has inserted it as a whole in his completed narrative at the point which he judged most suitable. To the same source should possibly be assigned the announcement of Saul's rejection in 13 8–15*a*.

The course of the narrative is resumed at 10 17 ff, where, in a second national assembly at Mizpah, Saul is selected by lot and accepted by the people as king (10 17–24); after which the people dispersed, and Saul returned to his home at Gibeah (vs 25–27). At a solemn assembly at Gilgal, at which the kingship is again formally conferred upon Saul, Samuel delivered a farewell address to his fellow-countrymen. A thunderstorm terrified the people; they were reassured, however, by Samuel with promises of the protection and favor of Jeh, if they continued to fear and serve Him (11 14—12 25). Later the rejection of Saul for disobedience and presumption is announced by Samuel (13 8–15*a*). The commission to destroy Amalek is delivered to Saul by Samuel; and the rejection of the king is again pronounced because of his failure to carry out the command. Agag is then slain by Samuel with his own hand; and, the latter having returned to his home at Ramah, the narrator adds that he remained there in seclusion until the day of his death, "mourning" for Saul, but refusing to meet him again (ch 15). Finally the death and burial of Samuel at Ramah, together with the lamentation of the people for him, are briefly recorded in 25 1, and referred to again in 28 3.

Two incidents of Samuel's life remain, in which he is brought into relation with the future king David. No indication of date or circumstance is given except that the first incident apparently follows immediately upon the second and final rejection of Saul as recorded in ch 15. In 16 1–13 is narrated the commission of Samuel to anoint a successor to Saul, and his fulfilment of the commission by the choice of David the son of Jesse, the Bethlehemite. And, in a later chapter (19 18–24), a second occasion is named on which the compelling spirit of prophecy came upon Saul, and again the proverbial saying, "Is Saul also among the prophets?" is quoted (19 24; cf 10 11.12), and is apparently regarded as taking its origin from this event.

The anointing of David by Samuel is a natural sequel to his anointing of Saul, when the latter has been rejected and his authority and rights as king have ceased. There is nothing to determine absolutely whether the narrative is derived from the same source as the greater part of the preceding history. Slight differences of style and the apparent presuppositions of the writer have led most scholars to the conclusion that it has a distinct and separate origin. If so, the compiler of the Books of S drew upon a third source for his narrative of the life of the seer, a source which there is no reason to regard as other than equally authentic and reliable. With the second incident related in 19 18–24, the case is different. It is hardly probable that so striking a proverb was suggested and passed into currency independently on two distinct occasions. It seems evident that here two independent sources or authorities were used, which gave hardly reconcilable accounts of the origin of a well-known saying, in one of which it has been mistakenly attributed to a similar but not identical occurrence in the life of Saul. In the final composition of the book both accounts were then inserted, without notice being taken of the inconsistency which was apparent between them.

Yet later in the history Samuel is represented as appearing to Saul in a vision at Endor on the eve of his death (28 11–20). The witch also sees the prophet and is stricken with fear. He is described as in appearance an old man "covered with a robe" (ver 14). In characteristically grave and measured tones he repeats the sentence of death against the king for his disobedience to Jeh, and announces its execution on the morrow; Saul's sons also will die with him (ver 19), and the whole nation will be involved in the penalty and suffering, as they all had a part in the sin.

3. Character and Influence of Samuel

The high place which Samuel occupies in the thought of the writers and in the tradition and esteem of the people is manifest throughout the history. The different sources from which the narrative is derived are at one in this, although perhaps not to an equal degree. He is the last and greatest of the judges, the first of the prophets, and inaugurates under Divine direction the Israelite kingdom and the Davidic line. It is not without reason, therefore, that he has been regarded as in dignity and importance occupying the position of a second Moses in relation to the people. In his exhortations and warnings the Deuteronomic discourses of Moses are reflected and repeated. He delivers the nation from the hand of the Philis, as Moses from Pharaoh and the Egyptians, and opens up for them a new national era of progress and order under the rule of the kings whom they have desired. Thus, like Moses, he closes the old order, and establishes the people with brighter prospects upon more assured foundations of national prosperity and greatness. In nobility of character and utterance also, and in fidelity to Jeh, Samuel is not unworthy to be placed by the side of the older lawgiver. The record of his life is not marred by any act or word which would appear unworthy of his office or prerogative. And the few references to him in the later literature (Ps 99 6; Jer 15 1; 1 Ch 6 28; 9 22; 11 3; 26 28; 29 29; 2 Ch 35 18) show how high was the estimation in which his name and memory were held by his fellow-countrymen in subsequent ages.

LITERATURE

I. Place in the Canon.—In the Heb Canon and enumeration of the sacred books of the OT, the two Books of S were reckoned as one, and formed the third division of the Earlier Prophets (נְבִיאִים רִאשֹׁנִים, nᵉbhī'īm rī'shōnīm). The one book bore the title "Samuel" (שְׁמוּאֵל, shᵉmū'ēl), not because Samuel was believed to be the author, but because his life and acts formed the main theme of the book, or at least of its earlier part. Nor was the Book of S separated by any real division in subject-matter or continuity of style from the Book of K, which in the original formed a single book, not two as in the Eng. and other modern VSS. The history was carried forward without interruption; and the record of the life of David, begun in S, was completed in K. This continuity in the narrative of Israelite history was made more prominent in the LXX, where the four books were comprised under one title and were known as the four "Books of the Kingdoms" (βίβλοι βασιλειῶν, bibloi basileiôn). This name was probably due to the translators or scholars of Alexandria. The division into four books, but not the Gr title, was then adopted in the Lat tr, where, however, the influence of Jerome secured the restoration of the Heb names, 1 and 2 S, and 1 and 2 K (Regum). Jerome's example was universally followed, and the fourfold division with the Heb titles found a place in all subsequent VSS of the OT Scriptures. Ultimately the distinction of S and K each into two books was received also into printed editions of the Heb Bible. This was done for the first time in the editio princeps of the Rabbinic Bible, printed at Venice in 1516–17 AD.

II. Contents and Period of the History.—The narrative of the two Books of S covers a period of about a hundred years, from the close of the unsettled era of the Judges to the establishment and consolidation of the kingdom under David. It is therefore a record of the changes, national and constitutional, which accompanied this growth and development of the national life, at the close of which the Israelites found themselves a united people under the rule of a king to whom all owed allegiance, controlled and guided by more or less definitely established institutions and laws. This may be described as the general purpose and main theme of the books, to trace the advance of the people under Divine guidance to a state of settled prosperity and union in the promised land, and to give prominence to the theocratic rule which was the essential condition of Israel's life as the people of God under all the changing forms of early government. The narrative therefore centers itself around the lives of the three men, Samuel, Saul and David, who were chiefly instrumental in the establishment of the monarchy, and to whom it was due more than to any others that Israel emerged from the depressed and disunited state in which the tribes had remained during the period of the rule of the Judges, and came into possession of a combined and effective national life. If the formal separation therefore into two books be disregarded, the history of Israel as it is narrated in "Samuel" is most naturally divided into three parts, which are followed by an appendix recording words and incidents which for some reason had not found a place in the general narrative:

A. The life and rule of Samuel (1 S 1–15) (death 1 S 25 1).
B. The life, reign and death of Saul (1 S 16—2 S 1).
C. The reign and acts of David to the suppression of the two rebellions of Absalom and Sheba (2 S 2–20).
D. Appendix; other incidents in the reign of David, the names of his chief warriors and his Song or Psalm of Praise (2 S 21–24).

III. Summary and Analysis.—To present a brief and clear analysis of these Books of S is not altogether easy. For as in the Pent and the earlier historical Books of Josh and Jgs, repetitions and apparently duplicate accounts of the same event are found, which interfere with the chronological development of the narrative. Even the main divisions, as stated above, to a certain extent overlap.

1. Life of Samuel (1 S 1–15)

(1) Visit of Hannah to Shiloh, and promise of the birth of a son (1 S 1 1–19); birth and weaning of Samuel, and presentation to Eli at Shiloh (1 19–28).

(2) Hannah's song or prayer (2 1–10); ministry of Samuel to Eli the priest (2 11.18–21.26); the evil practices of the sons of Eli and warning to Eli of the consequences to his house (2 12–17.22–25.27–36).

(3) Samuel's vision at the sanctuary and his induction to the prophetic office (3 1—4 1).

(4) Defeat of the Israelites by the Philis, capture of the ark of God, death of the two sons of Eli and of Eli himself (ch 4).

(5) Discomfiture of Dagon before the ark of God at Ashdod; return of the ark to Beth-shemesh, with expiatory offerings of golden tumors and golden mice; its twenty years' sojourn at Kiriath-jearim (5 1—7 4).

(6) Assembly of Israel under Samuel at Mizpah, and victory over the Philis (7 5–14); Samuel established as judge over all Israel (vs 15–17).

(7) Samuel's sons appointed to be judges and the consequent demand of the people for a king; Samuel's warning concerning the character of the king for whom they asked (ch 8).

(8) Saul's search for the lost asses of his father and meeting with Samuel (ch 9).

(9) Saul is anointed by Samuel to be ruler over the people of Israel, and receives the gift of prophecy (10 1–16); second assembly of the people under Samuel at Mizpah, and election of Saul to be king (vs 17–27).

(10) Victory of Saul over the Ammonites and deliverance of Jabesh-gilead (11 1–13); Saul made king in Gilgal (vs 14.15).

(11) Samuel's address to the people in Gilgal, defending his own life and action, and exhorting them to fear and serve the Lord (ch 12).

(12) Saul at Gilgal offers the burnt offering in Samuel's absence; gathering of the Philis to battle at Michmash; the Israelites' lack of weapons of iron (ch 13).

(13) Jonathan's surprise of the Phili army, and their sudden panic (14 1–23); Saul's vow, unwittingly broken by Jonathan, whom the people deliver from the fatal consequences (vs 24–45); victories of Saul over his enemies on every side (vs 46–52).

(14) War against Amalek, and Saul's disobedience to the Divine command to exterminate the Amalekites (ch 15).

2. Reign and Death of Saul (1 S 16—2 S 1)

(1) Anointing of David as Saul's successor (16 1–13); his summons to the court of Saul to act as minstrel before the king (vs 14–23).

(2) David and Goliath (ch 17).

(3) The love of David and Jonathan (18 1–4); the former's advancement and fame, the jealousy of Saul, and his attempt to kill David (18 5–16.29.30); David's marriage to the daughter of Saul (vs 17–28).

(4) Saul's renewed jealousy of David and second attempt to kill him (19 1–17); David's escape to Ramah, whither the king followed (vs 18–24).

(5) Jonathan's warning to David of his father's resolve and their parting (ch 20).

(6) David at Nob (21 1–9); and with Achish of Gath (vs 10–15).

(7) David's band of outlaws at Adullam (22 1.2); his provision for the safety of his father and mother in Moab (vs 3–5); vengeance of Saul on those who had helped David (vs 6–23).

(8) Repeated attempts of Saul to take David (chs 23, 24).

(9) Death of Samuel (25 1); Abigail becomes David's wife, after the death of her husband Nabal (vs 2–44).

(10) Saul's further pursuit of David (ch 26).

(11) David's sojourn with Achish of Gath (27 1—28 2.29); Saul and the witch of Endor (28 3–25).

(12) David's pursuit of the Amalekites who had raided Ziklag, and victory (ch 30).

(13) Battle between the Philis and Israel in Mt. Gilboa and death of Saul (ch 31).

(14) News of Saul's death brought to David at Ziklag (2 S 1 1–16); David's lamentation over Saul and Jonathan (vs 17–27).

3. Reign of David (2 S 2–20)

(1) David's seven and a half years' reign over Judah in Hebron (2 S 2 1—5 3).

(a) Consecration of David as king in Hebron (2 1–4*a*); message to the men of Jabesh-gilead (2 4*b*–7); Ish-bosheth made king over Northern Israel (vs 8–11); defeat of Abner and death of Asahel (vs 12–32).

(b) Increase of the fame and prosperity of David, and the names of his sons (3 1–5); Abner's submission to David, and treacherous murder of the former by Joab (vs 6–39).

(c) Murder of Ish-bosheth and David's vengeance upon his murderers (4 1–3.5–12); notice of the escape of Mephibosheth, when Saul and Jonathan were slain at Jezreel (ver 4).

(d) David accepted as king over all Israel (5 1–3).

(2) Reign of David in Jerus over united Israel (5 4—20 26).

(a) Taking of Jerus and victories over the Philis (5 4–25).

(b) Return of the ark to the city of David (ch 6).

(c) David's purpose to build a temple for the Lord (7 1–3); the Divine answer by the prophet Nathan, and the king's prayer (vs 4–29).

(d) Victories over the Philis, Syrians, and other peoples (ch 8).

(e) David's reception of Mephibosheth (ch 9).

(f) Defeat of the Ammonites and Syrians by the men of Israel under the command of Joab (10 1—11 1).

(g) David and Uriah, the latter's death in battle, and David's marriage with Bath-sheba (11 2–27).

(h) Nathan's parable and David's conviction of sin (12 1–15*a*); the king's grief and intercession for his sick son (vs 15*b*–25); siege and capture of Rabbah, the Ammonite capital (vs 26–31).

(i) Amnon and Tamar (13 1–22); Absalom's revenge and murder of Amnon (vs 23–36); flight of Absalom (vs 37–39).

(j) Return of Absalom to Jerus (14 1–24); his beauty, and reconciliation with the king (vs 25–33).

(k) Absalom's method of ingratiating himself with the people (15 1–6); his revolt and the flight of the king from Jerus (vs 7–31); meeting with Hushai (vs 32–37*a*); Absalom in Jerus (ver 37*b*).

(l) David's meeting with Ziba (16 1–4), and Shimei (vs 5–14); counsel of Ahitophel and Hushai (16 15—17 14); the news carried to David (vs 15–22); death of Ahitophel (ver 23).

(m) David at Mahanaim (17 24–29).

(n) The revolt subdued, death of Absalom, and reception by David of the tidings (18 1—19 8*a*).

(o) Return of the king to Jerus, and meetings with Shimei, Mephibosheth, and Barzillai the Gileadite (19 8*b*–43).

4. Appendix (2 S 21–24)

(1) Seven male descendants of Saul put to death at the instance of the Gibeonites (21 1–14); incidents of wars with the Philis (vs 15–22).

(2) David's song of thanksgiving and praise (ch 22).

(3) The "last words" of David (23 1–7); names and exploits of David's "mighty men" (vs 8–39).

(4) The king's numbering of the people, the resulting plague, and the dedication of the threshing-floor of Araunah the Jebusite (ch 24).

IV. Sources of the History.—The natural inference from the character and contents of the Books of S, as thus reviewed, is that the writer has made use of authorities, "sources" or "documents," from which he has compiled a narrative of the events which it was his desire to place on record. The same characteristics are noticeable here which are found in parts of the Pent and of the Books of Josh and Jgs, that in some instances duplicate or parallel accounts are given of one and the same event, which seems to be regarded from different points of view and is narrated in a style which is more or less divergent from that of the companion record. Examples of this so-called duplication are more frequent in the earlier parts of the books than in the later. There are presented, for instance, two accounts of Saul's election as king, and an act of disobedience is twice followed, apparently quite independently, by the sentence of rejection. Independent also and hardly consistent narratives are given of David's introduction to Saul (1 S 16 14–23; 17 31 ff.55 ff); and the two accounts of the manner of the king's death can be imperfectly reconciled only on the hypothesis that the young Amalekite told a false tale to David in order to magnify his own part in the matter. In these and other instances little or no attempt seems to be made to harmonize conflicting accounts, or to reconcile apparent discrepancies. In good faith the writer set down the records as he found them, making extracts or quotations from his authorities on the several events as they occurred, and thus building up his own history on the basis of the freest possible use of the materials and language of those who had preceded him.

However alien such a method of composition may appear to modern thought and usage in the West, it is characteristic of all early oriental writing. It would be almost impossible to find in any eastern literature a work of any length or importance which was not thus silently indebted to its predecessors, had incorporated their utterances, and had itself in turn suffered interpolation at the hands of later editors and transcribers. Accordingly, early Heb historical literature also, while unique in its spirit, conformed in its methods to the practice of the age and country in which it was composed. It would have been strange if it had been otherwise.

Two Main and Independent Sources

Apart from the appendix and minor additions, of which Hannah's song or psalm in 1 S 2 is one, the main portion of the book is derived from two independent sources, which themselves in all probability formed part of a larger whole, a more or less consecutive history or histories of Israel. These sources may, however, have been, as others think, rather of a biographical nature, presenting and enforcing the teaching of the acts and experience of the great leaders and rulers of the nation. The parallelism and duplication of the narrative is perhaps most evident in the history of Saul. The broad lines of distinction between the two may be defined without much difficulty or uncertainty. The greater part of the first eight chapters of 1 S is in all probability derived from the later of these two sources, to which is to be assigned more or less completely chs 10–12, 15, 17–19, 21–25, 28 and 2 S 1–7. The earlier source has contributed 1 S 9 with parts of chs 10, 11, 13, 14, 16, 20 and considerable portions of chs 22, 23, 26–27, 29–31, 2 S 1 (in part), 2–6, 9–20. Some details have probably been derived from other sources, and additions made by the editor or editors. This general determination of sources rests upon a difference of standpoint and religious conception, and upon slighter varieties of style which are neither so pronounced nor so readily distinguished as in the books of the Pent. It is reasonable also to bear in mind that a close and exact division or line of demarcation in every detail is not to be expected.

V. Character and Date of Sources.—Attempts which have been made to determine the date of these two sources, or to identify them with one or other of the principal authorities from which the historical narratives of the Pent are derived, have not been convincing. In the judgment of some, however, the later of the two sources should be regarded as a continuation of the narrative or document known as E, and the earlier be assigned to J. The style of the latter has much in common with the style of J, and is clear, vigorous and poetical; the religious conceptions also that are embodied and taught are of a simple and early type. The later writing has been supposed to give indications of the influence of the prophetic teaching of the 8th cent. The indications, however, are not sufficiently decisive to enable a final judgment to be formed. If it is borne in mind that J and E represent rather schools of teaching and thought than individual writers, the characteristics of the two sources of the Books of S would not be out of harmony with the view that from these two schools respectively were derived the materials out of which the history was compiled. The "sources" would then, according to the usual view, belong to the 9th and 8th cents. before the Christian era; and to a period not more than a century or a century and a half later should be assigned the final compilation and completion of the book as it is contained in the Heb Canon of Scripture.

VI. Greek Versions.—For an exact estimate and understanding of the history and text of the Books of S account must further be taken of the Gr version or versions. In the LXX there is great divergence from the Heb Massoretic text, and it is probable that in the course of transmission the Gr has been exposed to corruption to a very considerable extent. At least two recensions of the Gr text are in existence, represented by the Vatican and Alexandrian MSS respectively, of which the latter is nearer to the Heb original, and has apparently been conformed to it at a later period with a view to removing discrepancies; and this process has naturally impaired its value as a witness to the primary shape of the Gr text itself. There are therefore three existing types of the text of S; the Massoretic Heb and B and A in the Greek. The original form of the LXX, if it could be recovered, would represent a text anterior to the Massoretic recension, differing from, but not necessarily superior to, the latter. For the restoration of the Gr text, the Old Lat, where it is available, affords valuable help. It is evident then that in any given instance the agreement of these three types or recensions of the text is the strongest possible witness to the originality and authenticity of a reading; but that the weight attaching to the testimony of A will not in general, on account of the history of its text, be equivalent to that of either of the other two.

VII. Ethical and Religious Teaching.—The religious teaching and thought of the two Books of S it is not difficult to summarize. The books are in form a historical record of events; but they are at the same time and more particularly a history conceived with a definite purpose, and made to subserve a definite moral and religious aim. It is not a narrative of events solely, or the preservation of historical detail, that the writer has in view, but rather to elucidate and enforce from Israel's experience the significance of the Divine and moral government of the nation. The duty of king and people alike is to obey Jeh, to render strict and willing deference to His commands, and on this path of obedience alone will national independence and prosperity be secured. With the strongest emphasis, and with uncompromising severity, sin even in the highest places is condemned; and an ideal of righteousness is set forth in language and with an earnestness which recalls the exhortations of Dt. Thus the same is true of the Books of S as is manifest in the preceding books of the canonical OT: they are composed with a didactic aim. The experience of the past is made to afford lessons of warning and encouragement for the present. To the writer or writers—the history of the development and upbuilding of the Israelite kingdom is pregnant with a deeper meaning than lies on the surface, and this meaning he endeavors to make plain to his readers through the record. The issues of the events and the events themselves are under the guidance and control of Jeh, who always condemns and punishes wrong, but approves and rewards righteousness. Thus the narrative is history utilized to convey moral truth. And its value is to be estimated, not primarily as recording the great deeds of the past, but as conveying ethical teaching; that by means of the history with all its glamor and interest the people may be recalled to a sense of their high duty toward God, and be warned of the inevitable consequences of disobedience to Him.

SANAAS, san′ȧ-as (A and Fritzsche, Σανάας, Sanáas, B, Σαμά, Samá; AV Annaas): The sons of Sanaas returned in large numbers with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 23) = "Senaah" in Ezr 2 35; Neh 7 38. The numbers vary in each case (Esd, 3,330 or 3,301; Ezr, 3,630; Neh, 3,930).

SANABASSAR, san-a-bas′ar (in 1 Esd 2 12.15), SANABASSARUS, san-a-bas′a-rus (in 6 18.10; a name appearing in many variations, A always reading Σαναβάσσαρος, Sanabássaros, B, Σαναμασσάρῳ, Sanamassárō, in 2 12[11] [RVm Samanassar], Σαμανασσάρου, Samanassárou, in 2 15[14], but Σαβανασσάρῳ, Sabanassárō, in 6 18[17] [RVm] and Σαναβάσσαρος, Sanabássaros, in 6 20 [19]): He was "governor of Judaea" under Cyrus, conveyed the holy vessels of the temple from Babylon to Jerus and "laid the foundations of the house of the Lord" for the first time since its destruction (1 Esd 2 12. 15; 6 18–20) = "Sheshbazzar [q.v.] the prince of Judah" (Ezr 1 8).

Some identify him with Zerubbabel as AVm in 1 Esd 6 18: "Z., which is also S. the ruler." This view appears to be favored by the order of the words here, where, in case of two persons, one might expect "S. the ruler" to come first. Zerubbabel appears as "governor of Judaea" also in 1 Esd 6 27–29. Ezr 3 10 speaks of the foundation of the temple under Zerubbabel and 5 16 as under Sheshbazzar. There is further the analogy of 1 Esd 5 40, where Nehemias and Attharias refer to the same person. Against this identification: Zerubbabel is not styled ruler or governor either in Neh or Ezr, but in Hag 1 14; 2 2.21 he is peḥāh or governor of Judah; no explanation is given of the double name, as in the case of e.g. Daniel, Belteshazzar; the language of Ezr 5 14 f seems to refer to work commenced under a different person than Zerubbabel. Nor is there any reason against supposing a first return under Sheshbazzar (Sanabassar) and a foundation of the temple previous to the time of Zerubbabel—an undertaking into which the Jews did not enter heartily, perhaps because Sanabassar may have been a foreigner (though it is uncertain whether he was a Babylonian, a Persian, or a Jew). A later proposal is to identify Sanabassar with Shenazzar, the uncle of Zerubbabel in 1 Ch 3 18. But either of these identifications must remain doubtful. See Shenazzar; Zerubbabel.

SANASIB, san′a-sib (Fritzsche, Σανασίβ, Sanasíb, but B and Swete, Σαναβείς, Sanabeís, A, Ἀνασείβ, Anaseíb): Found only in 1 Esd 5 24, where the sons of Jeddu, the son of Jesus, are a priestly family returning "among the sons of Sanasib." The name is not found in the ‖ Ezr 2 36; Neh 7 39, and is perhaps preserved in the Vulg "Eliasib."

SANBALLAT, san-bal′at (סַנְבַלַּט, ṣanᵉbhallaṭ; Gr and Vulg Sanaballát, Pesh Samballat): Sanballat the Horonite was, if the appellation which follows his name indicates his origin, a Moabite of Horonaim, a city of Moab mentioned in Isa 15 5; Jer 48 2.5.34; Jos, Ant, XIII, xxiii; XIV, ii. He is named along with Tobiah, the Ammonite slave (Neh 4 1), and Geshem the Arabian (Neh 6 1) as the leading opponent of the Jews at the time when Nehemiah undertook to rebuild the walls of Jerus (Neh 2 10; 4 1; 6 1). He was related by marriage to the son of Eliashib, the high priest at the time of the annulment of the mixed marriages forbidden by the Law (Neh 13 28).

Renewed interest has been awakened in Sanballat from the fact that he is mentioned in the papyri I and II of Sachau (Die aramäischen Papyrusurkunden aus Elephantine, Berlin, 1908, and in his later work, Aramäische Papyrus und Ostraka, Leipzig, 1911; cf Staerk's convenient ed in Lietzmanns Kleine Texte, No. 32, 1908) as having been the governor (paḥath) of Samaria some time before the 17th year of Darius (Nothus), i.e. 408–407 BC, when Bagohi was governor of Judah. His two sons, Delaiah and Shelemiah, received a letter from Jedoniah and his companions the priests who were in Yeb (Elephantine) in Upper Egypt. This letter contained information concerning the state of affairs in the Jewish colony of Yeb, esp. concerning the destruction of the temple or synagogue (agora) which had been erected at that place.

The address of this letter reads as follows: "To our lord Bagohi, the governor of Judaea, his servants Jedoniah and his companions, the priests in the fortress of Yeb [Elephantine]. May the God of Heaven inquire much at every time after the peace of our lord and put thee in favor before Darius the king," etc. The conclusion of the letter reads thus: "Now, thy servants, Jedoniah and his companions and the Jews, all citizens of Yeb, say thus: If it seems good to our lord, mayest thou think on the rebuilding of that temple [the agora which had been destroyed by the Egyptians]. Since it has not been permitted us to rebuild it, do thou look on the receivers of thy benefactions and favors here in Egypt. Let a letter with regard to the rebuilding of the temple of the God Jaho in the fortress of Yeb, as it was formerly built, be sent from thee. In thy name will they offer the meal offerings, the incense, and the burnt offerings upon the altar of the God Jaho; and we shall always pray for thee, we and our wives and our children and all the Jews found here, until the temple has been rebuilt. And it will be to thee a meritorious work [çᵉdhāḳāh] in the sight of Jaho, the God of Heaven, greater than the meritorious work of a man who offers to him a burnt offering and a sacrifice of a value equal to the value of 1,000 talents of silver. And as to the gold [probably that which was sent by the Jews to Bagohi as a baksheesh] we have sent word and given knowledge. Also, we have in our name communicated in a letter all [these] matters unto Delaiah and Shelemiah, the sons of Sanballat, governor of Samaria. Also, from all that has been done to us, Arsham [the satrap of Egypt] has learned nothing.

Sanballat is the Bab Sin-uballit, "may Sin give him life," a name occurring a number of times in the contract tablets from the time of Nebuchadnezzar, Nabonidus, and Darius Hystaspis. (See Tallquist, Neubabylonisches Namenbuch, 183.)

Etymology

The root is found in the OT in the Heb vb. קָדַשׁ, ḳādhash, in the NT in the Gr vb. ἁγιάζω, hagiázō. The noun "sanctification" (ἁγιασμός, hagiasmós) does not occur in the OT and is found but 10 t in the NT, but the roots noted above appear in a group of important words which are of very frequent occurrence. These words are "holy," "hallow," "hallowed," "holiness," "consecrate," "saint," "sanctify," "sanctification." It must be borne in mind that these words are all tr^{s} of the same root, and that therefore no one of them can be treated adequately without reference to the others. All have undergone a certain development. Broadly stated, this has been from the formal, or ritual, to the ethical, and these different meanings must be carefully distinguished.

I. The Formal Sense.—By sanctification is ordinarily meant that hallowing of the Christian believer by which he is freed from sin and enabled to realize the will of God in his life. This is not, however, the first or common meaning in the Scriptures. To sanctify means commonly to make holy, that is, to separate from the world and consecrate to God.

1. In the OT

To understand this primary meaning we must go back to the word "holy" in the OT. That is holy which belongs to Jeh. There is nothing implied here as to moral character. It may refer to days and seasons, to places, to objects used for worship, or to persons. Exactly the same usage is shown with the word "sanctify." To sanctify anything is to declare it as belonging to God. "Sanctify unto me all the first-born . . . . it is mine" (Ex 13 2; cf Nu 3 13; 8 17). It applies thus to all that is connected with worship, to the Levites (Nu 3 12), the priests and the tent of meeting (Ex 29 44), the altar and all that touches it (Ex 29 36 f), and the offering (Ex 29 27; cf 2 Macc 2 18; Ecclus 7 31). The feast and holy days are to be sanctified, that is, set apart from ordinary business as belonging to Jeh (the Sabbath, Neh 13 19–22; a fast, Joel 1 14). So the nation as a whole is sanctified when Jeh acknowledges it and receives it as His own, "a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation" (Ex 19 5.6). A man may thus sanctify his house or his field (Lev 27 14.16), but not the firstling of the flock, for this is already Jeh's (Lev 27 26).

It is this formal usage without moral implication that explains such a passage as Gen 38 21. The word tr^{d} "prostitute" here is from the same √ ḳādhash, meaning lit., as elsewhere, the sanctified or consecrated one (ḳ^{e}dhēshāh; see margin and cf Dt 23 18; 1 K 14 24; Hos 4 14). It is the hierodule, the familiar figure of the old pagan temple, the sacred slave consecrated to the temple and the deity for immoral purposes. The practice is protested against in Israel (Dt 23 17 f), but the use of the term illustrates clearly the absence of anything essentially ethical in its primary meaning (cf also 2 K 10 20, "And Jehu said, Sanctify a solemn assembly for Baal. And they proclaimed it"; cf Joel 1 14).

Very suggestive is the transitive use of the word in the phrase, "to sanctify Jeh." To understand this we must note the use of the word "holy" as applied to Jeh in the OT. Its meaning is not primarily ethical. Jeh's holiness is His supremacy, His sovereignty, His glory, His essential being as God. To say the Holy One is simply to say God. Jeh's holiness is seen in His might, His manifested glory; it is that before which peoples tremble, which makes the nations dread (Ex 15 11–18; cf 1 S 6 20; Ps 68 35; 89 7; 99 2.3). Significant is the way in which "jealous" and "holy" are almost identified (Josh 24 19; Ezk 38 23). It is God asserting His supremacy, His unique claim. To sanctify Jeh, therefore, to make Him holy, is to assert or acknowledge or bring forth His being as God, His supreme power and glory, His sovereign claim. Ezekiel brings this out most clearly. Jeh has been profaned in the eyes of the nations through Israel's defeat and captivity. True, it was because of Israel's sins, but the nations thought it was because of Jeh's weakness. The ethical is not wanting in these passages. The people are to be separated from their sins and given a new heart (Ezk 36 25.26.33). But the word "sanctify" is not used for this. It is applied to Jeh, and it means the assertion of Jeh's power in Israel's triumph and the conquest of her foes (20 41; 28 25; 36 23; 38 16; 39 27). The sanctification of Jeh is thus the assertion of His being and power as God, just as the sanctification of a person or object is the assertion of Jeh's right and claim in the same.

The story of the waters of Meribah illustrates the same meaning. Moses' failure to sanctify Jeh is his failure to declare Jeh's glory and power in the miracle of the waters (Nu 20 12.13; 27 14; Dt 32 51). The story of Nadab and Abihu points the same way. Here "I will be sanctified" is the same as "I will be glorified" (Lev 10 1–3). Not essentially different is the usage in Isa 5 16: "Jeh of hosts is exalted in justice, and God the Holy One is sanctified in righteousness." Holiness again is the exaltedness of God, His supremacy, which is seen here in the judgment (justice, righteousness) meted out to the disobedient people (cf the recurrent refrain of 5 25; 9 12.17.21; 10 4; see JUSTICE; JUSTICE OF GOD). Isa 8 13; 29 23 suggest the same idea by the way in which they relate "sanctify" to fear and awe. One NT passage brings us the same meaning (1 Pet 3 15): "Sanctify in your hearts Christ as Lord," that is, exalt Him as supreme.

2. In the NT

In a few NT passages the OT ritual sense reappears, as when Jesus speaks of the temple sanctifying the gold, and the altar the gift (Mt 23 17.19; cf also He 9 13; 1 Tim 4 5). The prevailing meaning is that which we found in the OT. To sanctify is to consecrate or set apart. We may first take the few passages in the Fourth Gospel. As applied to Jesus in 10 36; 17 19, sanctify cannot mean to make holy in the ethical sense. As the whole context shows, it means to consecrate for His mission in the world. The reference to the disciples, "that they themselves also may be sanctified in truth," has both meanings: that they may be set apart (for Jesus sends them, as the Father sends Him), and that they may be made holy in truth.

This same meaning of consecration, or separation, appears when we study the word saint, which is the same as "sanctified one." Aside from its use in the Pss, the word is found mainly in the NT. Outside the Gospels, where the term "disciples" is used, it is the common word to designate the followers of Jesus, occurring some 56 t. By "saint" is not meant the morally perfect, but the one who belongs to Christ, just as the sanctified priest or offering belonged to Jeh. Thus Paul can salute the disciples at Corinth as saints and a little later rebuke them as carnal and babes, as those among whom are jealousy and strife, who walk after the manner of men (1 Cor 1 2; 3 1–3). In the same way the phrase "the sanctified" or "those that are sanctified" is used to designate the believers. By "the inheritance among all them that are sanctified" is meant the heritage of the Christian believer (Acts 20 32; 26 18; cf 1 Cor 1 2; 6 11; Eph 1 18; Col 1 12). This is the meaning in He, which speaks of the believer as being sanctified by the blood of Christ. In 10 29 the writer speaks of one who has fallen away, who "hath counted the blood of the covenant wherewith he was sanctified an unholy thing." Evidently it is not the inner and personal holiness of this apostate that is referred to, esp. in view of the tense, but that he had been separated unto God by this sacrificial blood and had then counted the holy offering a common thing. The contrast is between sacred and common, not between moral perfection and sin (cf 10 10; 13 12). The formal meaning appears again in 1 Cor 7 12–14, where the unbelieving husband is said to be sanctified by the wife, and vice versa. It is not moral character that is meant here, but a certain separation from the profane and unclean and a certain relation to God. This is made plain by the reference to the children: "Else were your children unclean; but now are they holy." The formal sense is less certain in other instances where we have the thought of sanctification in or by the Holy Spirit or in Christ; as in Rom 15 16, "being sanctified by the Holy Spirit"; 1 Cor 1 2, to "them that are sanctified in Christ Jesus"; 1 Pet 1 2, "in sanctification of the Spirit." Paul's doctrine of the Spirit as the new life in us seems to enter in here, and yet the reference to 1 Cor suggests that the primary meaning is still that of setting apart, the relating to God.

II. The Ethical Sense.—We have been considering so far what has been called the formal meaning of the word; but the chief interest of Christian thought lies in the ethical idea, sanctification considered as the active deed or process by which the life is made holy.

1. Transformation of Formal to Ethical Idea

Our first question is, How does the idea of belonging to God become the idea of transformation of life and character? The change is, indeed, nothing less than a part of the whole movement for which the entire Scriptures stand as a monument. The ethical is not wanting at the beginning, but the supremacy of the moral and spiritual over against the formal, the ritual, the ceremonial, the national, is the clear direction in which the movement as a whole tends. Now the pivot of this movement is the conception of God. As the thought of God grows more ethical, more spiritual, it molds and changes all other conceptions. Thus what it means to belong to God (holiness, sanctification) depends upon the nature of the God to whom man belongs. The hierodules of Corinth are women of shame because of the nature of the goddess to whose temple they belong. The prophets caught a vision of Jeh, not jealous for His prerogative, not craving the honor of punctilious and proper ceremonial, but with a gracious love for His people and a passion for righteousness. Their great message is: This now is Jeh; hear what it means to belong to such a God and to serve Him. "What unto me is the multitude of your sacrifices? . . . . Wash you, make you clean; . . . . seek justice, relieve the oppressed" (Isa 1 11.16.17). "When Israel was a child, then I loved him. . . . . I desire goodness, and not sacrifice; and the knowledge of God more than burnt-offerings" (Hos 11 1; 6 6).

In this way the formal idea that we have been considering becomes charged with moral meaning. To belong to God, to be His servant, His son, is no mere external matter. Jesus' teaching as to sonship is in point here. The word "sanctification" does not occur in the Synoptic Gospels at all, but "sonship" with the Jews expressed this same relation of belonging. For them it meant a certain obedience on the one hand, a privilege on the other. Jesus declares that belonging to God means likeness to Him, sonship is sharing His spirit of loving good will (Mt 5 43–48). Brother and sister for Jesus are those who do God's will (Mk 3 35). Paul takes up the same thought, but joins it definitely to the words "saint" and "sanctify." The religious means the ethical, those "that are sanctified" are "called to be saints" (1 Cor 1 2). The significant latter phrase is the same as in Rom 1 1, "Paul . . . . called to be an apostle." In this light we read Eph 4 1, "Walk worthily of the calling wherewith ye were called." Cf 1 Thess 2 12; Phil 1 27. And the end of this calling is that we are "foreordained to be conformed to the image of his Son" (Rom 8 29). We must not limit ourselves to the words "saint" or "sanctify" to get this teaching with Paul. It is his constant and compelling moral appeal: You belong to Christ; live with Him, live unto Him (Col 3 1–4; 1 Thess 5 10). It is no formal belonging, no external surrender. It is the yielding of the life in its passions and purposes, in its deepest affections and highest powers, to be ruled by a new spirit (Eph 4 13.20.23.24.32; cf Rom 12 1).

2. Relation to God Personal: NT Idea

But we do not get the full meaning of this thought of sanctification as consecration, or belonging, until we grasp the NT thought of our relation to God as personal. The danger has always been that this consecration should be thought of in a negative or passive way. Now the Christian's surrender is not to an outer authority but to an inner, living fellowship. The sanctified life is thus a life of personal fellowship lived out with the Father in the spirit of Christ in loving trust and obedient service. This positive and vital meaning of sanctification dominates Paul's thought. He speaks of living unto God, of living to the Lord, and, most expressively of all, of being alive unto God (Rom 14 8; cf 6 13; Gal 2 19). So completely is his life filled by this fellowship that he can say, "It is no longer I that live, but Christ liveth in me" (Gal 2 20). But there is no quietism here. It is a very rich and active life, this life of fellowship to which we are surrendered. It is a life of sonship in trust and love, with the spirit that enables us to say, "Abba, Father" (Rom 8 15; Gal 4 6). It is a life of unconquerable kindness and good will (Mt 5 43–48). It is a life of "faith working through love" (Gal 5 6), it is having the mind of Christ (Phil 2 5). The sanctified life, then, is the life so fully surrendered to fellowship with Christ day by day that inner spirit and outward expression are ruled by His spirit.

3. Sanctification as God's Gift

We come now to that aspect which is central for Christian interest, sanctification as the making holy of life, not by our act, but by God's deed and by God's gift. If holiness represents the state of heart and life in conformity with God's will, then sanctification is the deed or process by which that state is wrought. And this deed we are to consider now as the work of God. Jesus prays that the Father may sanctify His disciples in truth (Jn 17 17). So Paul prays for the Thessalonians (1 Thess 5 23), and declares that Christ is to sanctify His church (cf Rom 6 22; 2 Thess 2 13; 2 Tim 2 21; 1 Pet 1 2). Here sanctification means to make clean or holy in the ethical sense, though the idea of consecration is not necessarily lacking. But aside from special passages, we must take into account the whole NT teaching, according to which every part of the Christian life is the gift of God and wrought by His Spirit. "It is God that worketh in you both to will and to work" (Phil 2 13; cf Rom 8 2–4.9.14.16–26; Gal 5 22 f). Significant is the use of the words "creature" ("creation," see margin) and "workmanship" with Paul (2 Cor 5 17; Gal 6 15; Eph 2 10; 4 24). The new life is God's second work of creation.

4. Questions of Time and Method

When we ask, however, when and how this work is wrought, there is no such clear answer. What we have is on the one hand uncompromising ideal and demand, and on the other absolute confidence in God. By adding to these two the evident fact that the Christian believers seen in the NT are far from the attainment of such Christian perfection, some writers have assumed to have the foundation here for the doctrine that the state of complete holiness of life is a special experience in the Christian life wrought in a definite moment of time. It is well to realize that no NT passages give a specific answer to these questions of time and method, and that our conclusions must be drawn from the general teaching of the NT as to the Christian life.

First, it must be noted that in the NT view sanctification in the ethical sense is an essential element and inevitable result of all Christian life and experience.

5. An Element in All Christian Life

Looked at from the religious point of view, it follows from the doctrine of regeneration. Regeneration is the implanting of a new life in man. So far as that is a new life from God it is ipso facto holy. The doctrine of the Holy Spirit teaches the same (see HOLY SPIRIT). There is no Christian life from the very beginning that is not the work of the Spirit. "No man can [even] say, Jesus is Lord, but in the . . . . Spirit" (1 Cor 12 3). But this Spirit is the Holy Spirit, whether with Paul we say Spirit of Christ or Spirit of God (Rom 8 9). His presence, therefore, in so far forth means holiness of life. From the ethical standpoint the same thing is constantly declared. Jesus builds here upon the prophets: no religion without righteousness; clean hands, pure hearts, deeds of mercy are not mere conditions of worship, but joined to humble hearts are themselves the worship that God desires (Am 5 21–25; Mic 6 6–8). Jesus deepened the conception, but did not change it, and Paul was true to this succession. "If any man hath not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his. And if Christ is in you, ... the spirit is life because of righteousness" (Rom 8 9.10). There is nothing in Paul's teaching to suggest that sanctification is the special event of a unique experience, or that there are two kinds or qualities of sanctification. All Christian living meant for him clean, pure, right living, and that was sanctification. The simple, practical way in which he attacks the bane of sexual impurity in his pagan congregations shows this. "This is the will of God, even your sanctification, that ye abstain from fornication; that each one of you know how to possess himself of his own vessel in sanctification and honor. For God called us not for uncleanness, but in sanctification" (1 Thess 4 3.4.7). The strength of Paul's teaching, indeed, lies here in this combination of moral earnestness with absolute dependence upon God.

6. Follows from Fellowship with God

The second general conclusion that we draw from the NT teaching as to the Christian life is this: the sanctification which is a part of all Christian living follows from the very nature of that life as fellowship with God. Fundamental here is the fact that the Christian life is personal, that nothing belongs in it which cannot be stated in personal terms. It is a life with God in which He graciously gives Himself to us, and which we live out with Him and with our brothers in the spirit of Christ, which is His Spirit. The two great facts as to this fellowship are, that it is God's gift, and that its fruit is holiness. First, it is God's gift. What God gives us is nothing less than Himself. The gift is not primarily forgiveness, nor victory over sin, nor peace of soul, nor hope of heaven. It is fellowship with Him, which includes all of these and without which none of these can be. Secondly, the fruit of this fellowship is holiness. The real hallowing of our life can come in no other way. For Christian holiness is personal, not something formal or ritual, and its source and power can be nothing lower than the personal. Such is the fellowship into which God graciously lifts the believer. Whatever its mystical aspects, that fellowship is not magical or sacramental. It is ethical through and through. Its condition on our side is ethical. For Christian faith is the moral surrender of our life to Him in whom truth and right come to us with authority to command. The meaning of that surrender is ethical; it is opening the life to definite moral realities and powers, to love, meekness, gentleness, humility, reverence, purity, the passion for righteousness, to that which words cannot analyze but which we know as the Spirit of Christ. Such a fellowship is the supreme moral force for the molding of life. An intimate human fellowship is an analogue of this, and we know with what power it works on life and character. It cannot, however, set forth either the intimacy or the power of this supreme and final relation where our Friend is not another but is our real self. So much we know: this fellowship means a new spirit in us, a renewed and daily renewing life.

It is noteworthy that Paul has no hard-and-fast forms for this life. The reality was too rich and great, and his example should teach us caution in the insistence upon theological forms which may serve to compress the truth instead of expressing it. Here are some of his expressions for this life in us: to "have the mind of Christ" (1 Cor 2 16; Phil 2 5), "the Spirit of Christ" (Rom 8 9), "Christ is in you" (Rom 8 10), "the spirit which is from God" (1 Cor 2 12), "the Spirit of God" (1 Cor 3 16), "the Holy Spirit" (1 Cor 6 19), "the Spirit of the Lord" (2 Cor 3 17), "the Lord the Spirit" (2 Cor 3 18). But in all this one fact stands out, this life is personal, a new spirit in us, and that spirit is one that we have in personal fellowship with God; it is His Spirit. Especially significant is the way in which Paul relates this new life to Christ. We have already noted that Paul uses indifferently "Spirit of God" and "Spirit of Christ," and that in the same passage (Rom 8 9). Paul's great contribution to the doctrine of the Holy Spirit lies here. As he states it in 2 Cor 3 17: "Now the Lord is the Spirit." With that the whole conception of the Spirit gains moral content and personal character. The Spirit is personal, not some thing, nor some strange and magical power. The Spirit is ethical; there is a definite moral quality which is expressed when we say Christ. He has the Spirit who has the qualities of Christ. Thus the presence of the Spirit is not evidenced in the unusual, the miraculous, the ecstatic utterance of the enthusiast, or some strange deed of power, but in the workaday qualities of kindness, goodness, love, loyalty, patience, self-restraint (Gal 5 22 f). With this identification of the Spirit and the Christ in mind, we can better understand the passages in which Paul brings out the relation of Christ to the sanctification of the believer. He is the goal (Rom 8 29). We are to grow up in Him (Eph 4 15). He is to be formed in us (Gal 4 19). We are to behold Him and be changed into His image (2 Cor 3 17 f). This deepens into Paul's thought of the mystical relation with Christ. The Christian dies to sin with Him that he may live with Him a new life. Christ is now his real life. He dwells in Christ, Christ dwells in him. He has Christ's thoughts, His mind. See Rom 6 3–11; 8 9.10; 1 Cor 2 16; 15 22; Gal 2 20.

This vital and positive conception of the sanctification of the believer must be asserted against some popular interpretations. The symbols of fire and water, as suggesting cleansing, have sometimes been made the basis for a whole superstructure of doctrine. (For the former, note Isa 6 6 f; Lk 3 16; Acts 2 3; for the latter, Acts 2 38; 22 16; 1 Cor 6 11; Eph 5 26; Tit 3 5; He 10 22; Rev 1 5; 7 14.) There is a twofold danger here, from which these writers have not escaped. The symbols suggest cleansing, and their over-emphasis has meant first a negative and narrow idea of sanctification as primarily separation from sin or defilement. This is a falling back to certain OT levels. Secondly, these material symbols have been literalized, and the result has been a sort of mechanical or magical conception of the work of the Spirit. But the soul is not a substance for mechanical action, however sublimated. It is personal life that is to be hallowed, thought, affections, motives, desires, will, and only a personal agent through personal fellowship can work this end.

7. Is It Instantaneous and Entire?

The clear recognition of the personal and vital character of sanctification will help us with another problem. If the holy life be God's requirement and at the same time His deed, why should not this sanctification be instantaneous and entire? And does not Paul imply this, not merely in his demands but in his prayer for the Thessalonians, that God may establish their hearts in holiness, that He may sanctify them wholly and preserve spirit and soul and body entire, without blame at the coming of Our Lord Jesus Christ (1 Thess 3 13; 5 23)?

In answer to this we must first discriminate between the ideal and the empirical with Paul. Like John (1 Jn 1 6; 3 9), Paul insists that the life of Christ and the life of sin cannot go on together, and he knows no qualified obedience, no graduated standard. He brings the highest Christian demand to the poorest of his pagan converts. Nor have we any finer proof of his faith than this uncompromising idealism. On the other hand, how could he ask less than this? God cannot require less than the highest, but it is another question how the ideal is to be achieved. In the realm of the ideal it is always either . . . . or. In the realm of life there is another category. The question is not simply, Is this man sinner or saint? It is rather, What is he becoming? This matter of becoming is the really vital issue. Is this man turned the right way with all his power? Is his life wholly open to the Divine fellowship? Not the degree of achievement, but the right attitude toward the ideal, is decisive. Paul does not stop to resolve paradoxes, but practically he reckons with this idea. Side by side with his prayer for the Thessalonians are his admonitions to growth and progress (1 Thess 3 12; 5 14). Neither the absolute demand or the promise of grace gives us the right to conclude how the consummation shall take place.

8. Sanctification as Man's Task

That conclusion we can reach only as we go back again to the fundamental principle of the personal character of the Christian life and the relation thus given between the ethical and the religious. All Christian life is gift and task alike. "Work out your own salvation . . . . for it is God who worketh in you" (Phil 2 12 f). All is from God; we can only live what God gives. But there is a converse to this: only as we live it out can God give to us the life. This appears in Paul's teaching as to sanctification. It is not only God's gift, but our task. "This is the will of God, even your sanctification" (1 Thess 4 3). "Having therefore these promises . . . . let us cleanse ourselves from all defilement of flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness [hagiōsúnē] in the fear of God" (2 Cor 7 1). Significant is Paul's use of the word "walk." We are to "walk in newness of life," "by [or in] the Spirit," "in love," and "in Christ Jesus the Lord" (Rom 6 4; Gal 5 16; Eph 5 2; Col 2 6). The gift in each case becomes the task, and indeed becomes real and effective only in this activity. It is only as we walk by the Spirit that this becomes powerful in overcoming the lusts of the flesh (Gal 5 16; cf 5 25). But the ethical is the task that ends only with life. If God gives only as we live, then He cannot give all at once. Sanctification is then the matter of a life and not of a moment. The life may be consecrated in a moment, the right relation to God assumed and the man stand in saving fellowship with Him. The life is thus made holy in principle. But the real making holy is coextensive with the whole life of man. It is nothing less than the constant in-forming of the life of the inner spirit and outer deed with the Spirit of Christ until we, "speaking truth in love, may grow up in all things into him, who is the head" (Eph 4 15). (Read also Rom 6; that the Christian is dead to sin is not some fixed static fact, but is true only as he refuses the lower and yields his members to a higher obedience. Note that in 1 Cor 5 7 Paul in the same verse declares "ye are unleavened," and then exhorts "Purge out the old leaven, that ye may be a new lump"; cf also 1 Thess 5 5–10.)

We may sum up as follows: The word "sanctify" is used with two broad meanings: (1) The first is to devote, to consecrate to God, to recognize as holy, that is, as belonging to God. This is the regular OT usage and is most common in the NT. The prophets showed that this belonging to Jeh demanded righteousness. The NT deepens this into a whole-hearted surrender to the fellowship of God and to the rule of His Spirit. (2) Though the word itself appears in but few passages with this sense, the NT is full of the thought of the making holy of the Christian's life by the Spirit of God in that fellowship into which God lifts us by His grace and in which He gives Himself to us. This sanctifying, or hallowing, is not mechanical or magical. It is wrought out by God's Spirit in a daily fellowship to which man gives himself in aspiration and trust and obedience, receiving with open heart, living out in obedient life. It is not negative, the mere separation from sin, but the progressive hallowing of a life that grows constantly in capacity, as in character, into the stature of full manhood as it is in Christ. And from this its very nature it is not momentary, but the deed and the privilege of a whole life. See also HOLY SPIRIT and the following article.

WESLEYAN DOCTRINE

1. Doctrine Stated

Christian perfection, through entire sanctification, by faith, here and now, was one of the doctrines by which John Wesley gave great offence to his clerical brethren in the Anglican church. From the beginning of his work in 1739, till 1760, he was formulating this doctrine. At the last date there suddenly arose a large number of witnesses among his followers. Many of these he questioned with Baconian skill, the result being a confirmation of his theories on various points.

In public address he used the terms "Christian Perfection," "Perfect Love," and "Holiness," as synonymous, though there are differences between them when examined critically. With St. Paul he taught that all regenerate persons are saints, i.e. holy ones, as the word "saint," from Lat sanctus, through the Norman-Fr., signifies (1 Cor 1 2; 2 Cor 1 1). His theory is that in the normal Christian the principle of holiness, beginning with the new birth, gradually expands and strengthens as the believer grows in grace and in the knowledge of the truth, till, by a final, all-surrendering act of faith in Christ, it reaches an instantaneous completion through the act of the Holy Spirit, the sanctifier: 2 Cor 7 1, "perfecting holiness," etc; Eph 4 13, AV "Till we all come . . . . unto a perfect man," etc. Thus sanctification is gradual, but entire sanctification is instantaneous (Rom 6 6, "our old man was crucified," etc, a sudden death; Gal 2 20, "I have been crucified with Christ; and it is no longer I that live"). In 1 Thess 5 23, the word "sanctify" is a Gr aorist tense, signifying an act and not a process, as also in Jn 17 19, "that they . . . . may be sanctified in truth," or truly. (See Meyer's note.) Many Christians experience this change on their deathbeds. If death suddenly ends the life of a growing Christian before he is wholly sanctified, the Holy Spirit perfects the work. Wesley's advice to the preachers of this evangelical perfection was to draw and not to drive, and never to quote any threatenings of God's word against God's children. The declaration, "Without sanctification no man shall see the Lord" (He 12 14), does not apply to the saints, "the holy ones."

Wesley's perfection of love is not perfection of degree, but of kind. Pure love is perfect love. The gradual growth toward perfect purity of love is beautifully expressed in Monod's hymn,

"O the bitter shame and sorrow!"
The first response to the Saviour's call is,
"All of self, and none of Thee."
But after a view of Christ on the cross, the answer is faintly,
"Some of self, and some of Thee."
Then, after a period of growing love, the cry is,
"Less of self, and more of Thee."
After another period, the final cry is,
"None of self, and all of Thee!"
an aspiration for pure love, without any selfishness.

The attainment of this grace is certified by the total cessation of all servile fear (1 Jn 4 18). Wesley added to this the witness of the Spirit, for which his only proof-text is 1 Cor 2 12.

2. Objections Answered

(1) Paul, in Phil 3 12, declares that he is not "made perfect": (a) in ver 15, he declares that he is perfect; (b) "made perfect" is a term, borrowed from the ancient games, signifying a finished course. This is one of the meanings of teleióō, as seen also in Lk 13 32 m, "The third day I end my course." Paul no more disclaims spiritual perfection in these words than does Christ before "the third day." Paul claims in ver 15, by the use of an adj., that he is perfect. In ver 12 Paul claims that he is not perfect as a victor, because the race is not ended. In ver 15 he claims that he is perfect as a racer.

(2) Paul says (1 Cor 15 31), "I die daily." This does not refer to death to sin, as some say that it does, but to his daily danger of being killed for preaching Christ, as in Rom 8 36, "we are killed all the day long."

(3) 1 Jn 1 8: "If we say that we have no sin," etc. (a) If this includes Christians, it contradicts John himself in the very next verse, and in 3 9, "Whosoever is begotten of God doeth no sin," and Jn 8 36, "If . . . . the Son shall make you free," etc, and in all those texts in the NT declaring sins forgiven.

(b) Bishop Westcott says that the expression, "to have sin," is distinguished from "to sin," as the sinful principle is distinguished from the sinful act in itself. It includes the idea of personal guilt. Westcott asserts that John refers to the Gnostics, who taught that moral evil exists only in matter, and never touches spirit, which is always holy; and, therefore, though guilty of all manner of vice, their spirits had no need of atonement, because they were untouched by sin, which existed only in their bodies, as it does in all matter. When told that this made the body of Christ sinful, they denied the reality of His body, saying that it was only a phantom. Hence, in the very first verse of this Ep., John writes evidently against the gnostic error, quoting three of the five senses to prove the reality of Christ's humanity. (By all means, see "The Epp. of St. John," Cambridge Bible for Schools, etc, 17–21.)

3. Required for the Highest Success of the Preacher

The relation of this doctrine to the Methodist Episcopal church in the United States is seen in the following questions, which have been affirmatively answered in public by all its preachers on their admission to the Conferences: "Are you going on to perfection?"; "Do you expect to be made perfect in love in this life?"; "Are you earnestly striving after it?"

4. Hymnology

The hymns of the Wesleys, still universally sung, are filled with this doctrine, in which occur such expressions as:

"Take away our bent to sinning," . . . .
"Let us find that second rest," . . . .
"Make and keep me pure within," . . . .
"'Tis done! Thou dost this moment save,
With full salvation bless." . . . .

5. Its Glorious Results

To the preaching of Christian perfection Wesley ascribed the success of his work in the conversion, religious training and intellectual education of the masses of Great Britain. It furnished him a multitude of consecrated workers, many of them lay preachers, who labored in nearly every hamlet, and who carried the gospel into all the British colonies, including America. It is declared by secular historians that this great evangelical movement, in which the doctrine of entire sanctification was so prominent, saved England from a disastrous revolution, like that which drenched France with the blood of its royal family and its nobility, in the last decade of the 18th cent. It is certain that the great Christian and humanitarian work of William Booth, originally a Methodist, was inspired by this doctrine which he constantly preached. This enabled his followers in the early years of the Salvation Army to endure the persecutions which befell them at that time.

6. Personal Testimony

On March 6, 1760, Wesley enters in his Journal the following testimony of one Elizabeth Longmore: "'I felt my soul was all love. I was so stayed on God as I never felt before, and knew that I loved Him with all my heart. . . . And the witness that God had saved me from all my sins grew clearer every hour. . . . I have never since found my heart wander from God.' Now this is what I always did, and do now, mean by perfection. And this I believe many have attained, on the same evidence that I believe many are justified."

We have Wesley's only recorded testimony to his own justification in these words (May 24, 1738): "I felt my heart strangely warmed . . . . and an assurance was given me that He had taken away my sins," etc.

Literature

1. Nature of the Article

The present art. is designed to supplement the arts. on Altars; High Place; Pentateuch; Tabernacle; Temple, by giving an outline of certain rival views of the course of law and history as regards the place of worship. The subject has a special importance because it was made the turning-point of Wellhausen's discussion of the development of Israel's literature, history and religion. He himself writes: "I differ from Graf chiefly in this, that I always go back to the centralization of the cultus, and deduce from it the particular divergences. My whole position is contained in my first chapter" (Prolegomena, 368). For the purposes of this discussion it is necessary to use the symbols JE, D, H, and P, which are explained in the art. Pentateuch.

It is said that there are three distinct stages of law and history.

(1) In the first stage all slaughter of domestic animals for food purposes was sacrificial, and every layman could sacrifice locally at an altar of earth or unhewn stones. The law of JE is contained in Ex

2. The Graf-Wellhausen Hypothesis

20 24–26, providing for the making of an altar of earth or stones, and emphasis is laid on the words "in every place ["in all the place" is grammatically an equally possible rendering] where I record my name I will come unto thee and I will bless thee." This, it is claimed, permits a plurality of sanctuaries. Illustrations are provided by the history. The patriarchs move about the country freely and build altars at various places. Later sacrifices or altars are mentioned in connection with Jethro (Ex 18 12), Moses (17 15, etc), Joshua (Josh 8 30), Gideon (Jgs 6 26 etc), Manoah (13 19), Samuel (1 S 7 17, etc), Elijah (1 K 18 32), to take but a few instances. Perhaps the most instructive case is that of Saul after the battle of Michmash. Observing that the people were eating meat with blood, he caused a large stone to be rolled to him, and we are expressly told that this was the first altar that he built to the Lord (1 S 14 35). While some of these examples might be accounted for by theophanies or other special circumstances, they are too numerous when taken together for such an explanation to suffice. In many instances they represent the conduct of the most authoritative and religious leaders of the age, e.g. Samuel, and it must be presumed that such men knew and acted upon the Law of their own day. Hence the history and the Law of Ex 20 are in unison in permitting a multiplicity of sanctuaries. Wellhausen adds: "Altars as a rule are not built by the patriarchs according to their own private judgment wheresoever they please; on the contrary, a theophany calls attention to, or, at least afterward, confirms, the holiness of the place" (op. cit., 31).

(2) The second stage is presented by Dt in the Law and Josiah's reformation in the history. Undoubtedly Dt 12 permits local non-sacrificial slaughter for the purposes of food, and enjoins the destruction of heathen places of worship, insisting with great vehemence on the central sanctuary. The narrative of Josiah's reformation in 2 K 23 tallies with these principles.

(3) The third great body of law (P) does not deal with the question (save in one passage, Lev 17). In Dt "the unity of the cultus is commanded; in the PC it is presupposed. . . . . What follows from this forms the question before us. To my thinking, this: that the PC rests upon the result which is only the aim of Dt" (Prolegomena, 35). Accordingly, it is later than the latter book and dates from about the time of Ezra. As to Lev 17 1–9, this belongs to H, an older collection of laws than P, and is taken up in the latter. Its intention was "to secure the exclusive legitimation of the one lawful place of sacrifice. . . . . Plainly the common man did not quite understand the newly drawn and previously quite unknown distinction between the religious and the profane act" (Prolegomena, 50). Accordingly, this legislator strove to meet the difficulty by the new enactment. See CRITICISM (The Graf-Wellhausen Hypothesis).

3. Difficulties of the Theory

(1) Slaughter not necessarily sacrificial.—The general substratum afforded by the documentary theory falls within the scope of the art. PENTATEUCH. The present discussion is limited to the legal and historical outline traced above. The view that all slaughter of domestic animals was sacrificial till the time of Josiah is rebutted by the evidence of the early books. The following examples should be noted: in Gen 18 7 a calf is slain without any trace of a sacrifice, and in 27 9–14 (Jacob's substitute for venison) no altar or religious rite can fairly be postulated. In 1 S 28 24 the slaughter is performed by a woman, so that here again sacrifice is out of the question. If Gideon performed a sacrifice when he "made ready a kid" (Jgs 6 19) or when he killed an animal for the broth of which the narrative speaks, the animals in question must have been sacrificed twice over, once when they were killed and again when the food was consumed by flames. Special importance attaches to Ex 22 1 (Heb 21 37), for there the JE legislation itself speaks of slaughter by cattle thieves as a natural and probable occurrence, and it can surely not have regarded this as a sacrificial act. Other instances are to be found in Gen 43 16; 1 S 25 11; 1 K 19 21. In 1 S 8 13 the word tr^{d} "cooks" means lit. "women slaughterers." All these instances are prior to the date assigned to Dt. With respect to Lev 17 1–7 also, the theory is unworkable. At any time in King Josiah's reign or after, it would have been utterly impossible to limit all slaughter of animals for the whole race wherever resident to one single spot. This part of the theory therefore breaks down.

(2) Sacrifice and theophany.—The view that the altars were erected at places that were peculiarly holy, or at any rate were subsequently sanctified by a theophany, is also untenable. In the Patriarchal age we may refer to Gen 4 26, where the calling on God implies sacrifice but not theophanies, Abram at Beth-el (12 8) and Mamre (13 18), and Jacob's sacrifices (31 54; 33 20). Compare later Samuel's altar at Ramah, Adonijah's sacrifice at En-rogel (1 K 1), Naaman's earth (2 K 5), David's clan's sacrifice (1 S 20 6.29). It is impossible to postulate theophanies for the sacrifices of every clan in the country, and it becomes necessary to translate Ex 20 24 "in all the place" (see supra 2, [1]) and to understand "the place" as the territory of Israel.

(3) Alleged plurality of sanctuaries.—The hypothesis of a multiplicity of sanctuaries in JE and the history also leaves out of view many most important facts. The truth is that the word "sanctuary" is ambiguous and misleading. A plurality of altars of earth or stone is not a plurality of sanctuaries. The early legislation knows a "house of Jeh" in addition to the primitive altars (Ex 23 19; 34 26; cf the parts of Josh 9 23.27 assigned to J). No eyewitness could mistake a house for an altar, or vice versa.

(4) The altar of God's house.—Moreover a curious little bit of evidence shows that the "house" had quite a different kind of altar. In 1 K 1 50 f; 2 28 ff, we hear of the horns of the altar (cf Am 3 14). Neither earth nor unhewn stones (as required by the Law of Ex 20) could provide such horns, and the historical instances of the altars of the patriarchs, religious leaders, etc, to which reference has been made, show that they had no horns. Accordingly we are thrown back on the description of the great altar of burnt offering in Ex 27 and must assume that an altar of this type was to be found before the ark before Solomon built his Temple. Thus the altar of the House of God was quite different from the customary lay altar, and when we read of "mine altar" as a refuge in Ex 21 14, we must refer it to the former, as is shown by the passages just cited. In addition to the early legislation and the historical passages cited as recognizing a House of God with a horned altar, we see such a house in Shiloh where Eli and his sons of the house of Aaron (1 S 2 27) ministered. Thus the data of both JE and the history show us a House of God with a horned altar side by side with the multiplicity of stone or earthen altars, but give us no hint of a plurality of legitimate houses or shrines or sanctuaries.

(5) Local altars in Deuteronomy.—Dt also recognizes a number of local altars in 16 21 (see ICC, ad loc.) and so does D_2 in Josh 8 30 ff. There is no place for any of these passages in the Wellhausen theory; but again we find one house side by side with many lay altars.

4. The Alternative View

(1) Lay sacrifice.—The alternative view seeks to account for the whole of the facts noted above. In bald outline it is as follows: In pre-Mosaic times customary sacrifices had been freely offered by laymen at altars of earth or stone which were not "sanctuaries," but places that could be used for the nonce and then abandoned. Slaughter, as shown by the instances cited, was not necessarily sacrificial. Moses did not forbid or discourage the custom he found. On the contrary, he regulated it in Ex 20 24–26; Dt 16 21 f to prevent possible abuses. But he also superimposed two other kinds of sacrifice—certain new offerings to be brought by individuals to the religious capital and the national offerings of Nu 28, 29 and other passages. If P assumes the religious capital as axiomatic, the reason is that this portion of the Law consists of teaching intrusted to the priests, embracing the procedure to be followed in these two classes of offerings, and does not refer at all to the procedure at customary lay sacrifices, which was regulated by immemorial custom. Dt thunders not against the lay altars—which are never even mentioned in this connection—but against the Canaanitish high places. Dt 12 contemplates only the new individual offerings. The permission of lay slaughter for food was due to the fact that the infidelity of the Israelites in the wilderness (Lev 17 5–7) had led to the universal prohibition of lay slaughter for the period of the wanderings only, though it appears to be continued by Dt for those who lived near the House of God (see 12 21, limited to the case "if the place . . . . be too far from thee").

(2) Three pilgrimage festivals in JE.—The JE legislation itself recognizes the three pilgrimage festivals of the House of God (Ex 34 22 f). One of these festivals is called "the feast of weeks, even of the bikkūrīm [a kind of first-fruits] of wheat harvest," and as 23 19 and 34 26 require these bikkūrīm to be brought to the House of God and not to a lay altar, it follows that the pilgrimages are as firmly established here as in Dt. Thus we find a House (with a horned altar) served by priests and lay altars of earth or stone side by side in law and history till the exile swept them all away, and by breaking the continuity of tradition and practice paved the way for a new and artificial interpretation of the Law that was far removed from the intent of the lawgiver.

5. The Elephantine Papyri

The Elephantine temple.—Papyri have recently been found at Elephantine which show us a Jewish community in Egypt which in 405 BC possessed a local temple. On the Wellhausen hypothesis it is usual to assume that P and Dt were still unknown and not recognized as authoritative in this community at that date, although the Deuteronomic law of the central sanctuary goes back at least to 621. It is difficult to understand how a law that had been recognized as Divine by Jeremiah and others could still have been unknown or destitute of authority. On the alternative view this phenomenon will have been the result of an interpretation of the Law to suit the needs of an age some 800 years subsequent to the death of Moses in circumstances he never contemplated. The Pent apparently permits sacrifice only in the land of Israel: in the altered circumstances the choice lay between interpreting the Law in this way or abandoning public worship altogether; for the synagogue with its non-sacrificial form of public worship had not yet been invented. All old legislations have to be construed in this way to meet changing circumstances, and this example contains nothing exceptional or surprising.

SAND (חוֹל, ḥōl; ἄμμος, ámmos; a variant of the more usual ψάμμος, psámmos; cf ἄμαθος, ámathos, ψάμαθος, psámathos):

Sand is principally produced by the grinding action of waves. This is accompanied by chemical solution, with the result that the more soluble constituents of the rock diminish in amount or disappear and the sands tend to become more or less purely silicious, silica or quartz being a common constituent of rocks and very insoluble. The rocks of Pal are so largely composed of limestone that the shore and dune sands are unusually calcareous, containing from 10 to 20 per cent of calcium carbonate. This is subject to solution and redeposition as a cement between the sand grains, binding them together to form the porous sandstone of the seashore, which is easily worked and is much used in building. See Rock, III, (2).

Figurative: (1) Used most often as a symbol of countless multitude; esp. of the children of Israel (Gen 22 17; 32 12; 2 S 17 11; 1 K 4 20; Isa 10 22; 48 19; Jer 33 32; Hos 1 10; Rom 9 27; He 11 12); also of the enemies of Israel (Josh 11 4; Jgs 7 12; 1 S 13 5; cf Rev 20 8). Joseph laid up grain as the sand of the sea (Gen 41 49); God gave Solomon wisdom and understanding and largeness of heart as the sand that is on the seashore (1 K 4 29); Job says "I shall multiply my days as the sand" (Job 29 18); the multitude of quails provided for the Israelites in the desert is compared to the sand (Ps 78 27); the Psalmist says of the thoughts of God, "They are more in number than the sand" (Ps 139 18); Jeremiah, speaking of the desolation of Jerus, says that the number of widows is as the sand (Jer 15 8). (2) Sand is also a symbol of weight (Job 6 3; Prov 27 3), and (3) of instability (Mt 7 26).

It is a question what is meant by "the hidden treasures of the sand" in Dt 33 19.

1. Name

SANHEDRIN, san′hē-drin (סַנְהֶדְרִין, ṣanhedhrīn, the Talmudic transcription of the Gr συνέδριον, sunédrion): The Sanhedrin was, at and before the time of Christ, the name for the highest Jewish tribunal, of 71 members, in Jerus, and also for the lower tribunals, of 23 members, of which Jerus had two (Tōṣephtā' Ḥăghīghāh 11 9; Ṣanh. 1 6; 11 2). It is derived from sún, "together," and hédra, "seat." In Gr and Rom literature the senates of Sparta, Carthage, and even Rome, are so called (cf Pausan. iii.11, 2; Polyb. iii.22; Dion Cassius xl.49). In Jos we meet with the word for the first time in connection with the governor Gabinius (57–55 BC), who divided the whole of Pal into 5 sunédria (Ant, XIV, v, 4), or súnodoi (BJ, I, viii, 5); and with the term sunedrion for the high council in Jerus first in Ant, XIV, ix, 3–5, in connection with Herod, who, when a youth, had to appear before the sunedrion at Jerus to answer for his doings in Galilee. But before that date the word appears in the LXX version of Proverbs (c 130 BC), esp. in 22 10; 31 23, as an equivalent for the Mishnaic bēth-dīn=“judgment-chamber.”

In the NT the word sometimes, esp. when used in the pl. (Mt 10 17; Mk 13 9; cf Ṣanh. 1 5), means simply “court of justice,” i.e. any judicatory (Mt 5 22). But in most cases it is used to designate the supreme Jewish Court of Justice in Jerus, in which the process against Our Lord was carried on, and before which the apostles (esp. Peter and John, Stephen, and Paul) had to justify themselves (Mt 26 59; Mk 14 55; 15 1; Lk 22 66; Jn 11 47; Acts 4 15; 5 21 ff; 6 12 ff; 22 30; 23 1 ff; 24 20). Sometimes presbutérion (Lk 22 66; Acts 22 5) and gerousía (Acts 5 21) are substituted for sunedrion. See Senate.

In the Jewish tradition-literature the term “Sanhedrin” alternates with kᵉnīshtā', “meeting-place” (Mᵉghillath Taʽănīth 10, compiled in the 1st cent. AD), and bēth-dīn, “court of justice” (Ṣanh. 11 2.4). As, according to Jewish tradition, there were two kinds of sunedria, viz. the supreme sunedrion in Jerus of 71 members, and lesser sunedria of 23 members, which were appointed by the supreme one, we find often the term ṣanhedhrīn gᵉdhōlāh, “the great Sanhedrin,” or bēth-dīn ha-gādhōl, “the great court of justice” (Middōth 5 4; Ṣanh. 1 6), or ṣanhedhrin gᵉdhōlāh ha-yōshebheth bᵉ-lishᵉkhath ha-gāzīth, “the great Sanhedrin which sits in the hall of hewn stone.”

2. Origin and History

There is lack of positive historical information as to the origin of the Sanhedrin. According to Jewish tradition (cf Ṣanh. 1 6) it was constituted by Moses (Nu 11 16–24) and was reorganized by Ezra immediately after the return from exile (cf the Tg to Cant 6 1). But there is no historical evidence to show that previous to the Gr period there existed an organized aristocratic governing tribunal among the Jews. Its beginning is to be placed at the period in which Asia was convulsed by Alexander the Great and his successors.

The Hellenistic kings conceded a great amount of internal freedom to municipal communities, and Pal was then practically under home rule, and was governed by an aristocratic council of Elders (1 Macc 12 6; 2 Macc 1 10; 4 44; 11 27; 3 Macc 1 8; cf Jos, Ant, XII, iii, 4; XIII, v, 8; Mᵉghillath Taʽănīth 10), the head of which was the hereditary high priest. The court was called Gerousia, which in Gr always signifies an aristocratic body (see Westermann in Pauly's RE, III, 49). Subsequently this developed into the Sanhedrin.

During the Rom period (except for about 10 years at the time of Gabinius, who applied to Judaea the Rom system of government; cf Marquardt, Römische Staatsverwaltung, I, 501), the Sanhedrin's influence was most powerful, the internal government of the country being practically in its hands (Ant, XX, x), and it was religiously recognized even among the Diaspora (cf Acts 9 2; 22 5; 26 12). According to Schürer (HJP, div II, vol 1, 171; GJV^{4}, 236) the civil authority of the Sanhedrin, from the time of Archelaus, Herod the Great's son, was probably restricted to Judaea proper, and for that reason, he thinks, it had no judicial authority over Our Lord so long as He remained in Galilee (but see G. A. Smith, Jerus, I, 416).

The Sanhedrin was abolished after the destruction of Jerus (70 AD). The bēth-dīn (court of judgment) in Jabneh (68–80), in Usah (80–116), in Shafran (140–63), in Sepphoris (163–93), in Tiberias (193–220), though regarded in the Talm (cf Rō'sh ha-shānāh 31a*) as having been the direct continuation of the Sanhedrin, had an essentially different character; it was merely an assembly of scribes, whose decisions had only a theoretical importance (cf Ṣōṭāh 9 11).

3. Constitution

The Great Sanhedrin in Jerus was formed (Mt 26 3.57.59; Mk 14 53; 15 1; Lk 22 66; Acts 4 5 f; 5 21; 22 30) of high priests (i.e. the acting high priest, those who had been high priests, and members of the privileged families from which the high priests were taken), elders (tribal and family heads of the people and priesthood), and scribes (i.e. legal assessors), Pharisees and Sadducees alike (cf Acts 4 1 ff; 5 17.34; 23 6). In Mk 15 43; Lk 23 50, Joseph of Arimathaea is called bouleutḗs, “councillor,” i.e. member of the Sanhedrin.

According to Jos and the NT, the acting high priest was as such always head and president (Mt 26 3.57; Acts 5 17 ff; 7 1; 9 1 f; 22 5; 23 2; 24 1; Ant, IV, viii, 17; XX, x). Caiaphas is president at the trial of Our Lord, and at Paul's trial Ananias is president. On the other hand, according to the Talm (esp. Ḥăghīghāh 2 2), the Sanhedrin is represented as a juridical tribunal of scribes, in which one scribe acted as nāsī', “prince,” i.e. president, and another as 'abh-bēth-dīn, father of the judgment-chamber, i.e. vice-president. So far, it has not been found possible to reconcile these conflicting descriptions (see “Literature,” below).

Ṣanh. 4 3 mentions the ṣōphᵉrē-ha-dayānīm, “notaries,” one of whom registered the reasons for acquittal, and the other the reasons for condemnation. In the NT we read of hupērétai, “constables” (Mt 5 25) and of the “servants of the high priest” (Mt 26 51; Mk 14 47; Jn 18 10), whom Jos describes as “enlisted from the rudest and most restless characters” (Ant, XX, viii, 8; ix, 2). Jos speaks of the “public whip,” Matthew mentions “tormentors” (18 34), Luke speaks of “spies” (20 20).

The whole history of post-exilic Judaism circles round the high priests, and the priestly aristocracy always played the leading part in the Sanhedrin (cf Ṣanh. 4 2). But the more the Pharisees grew in importance, the more were they represented in the Sanhedrin. In the time of Salome they were so powerful that “the queen ruled only in name, but the Pharisees in reality” (Ant, XIII, xvi, 2). So in the time of Christ, the Sanhedrin was formally led by the Sadducean high priests, but practically ruled by the Pharisees (Ant, XVIII, i, 4).

4. Jurisdiction

In the time of Christ the Great Sanhedrin at Jerus enjoyed a very high measure of independence. It exercised not only civil jurisdiction, according to Jewish law, but also, in some degree, criminal. It had administrative authority and could order arrests by its own officers of justice (Mt 26 47; Mk 14 43; Acts 4 3; 5 17 f; 9 2; cf Ṣanh. 1 5). It was empowered to judge cases which did not involve capital punishment, which latter required the confirmation of the Rom procurator (Jn 18 31; cf Jerus Ṣanh. 1 1; 7 2 [p. 24]; Jos, Ant, XX, ix, 1). But, as a rule, the procurator arranged his judgment in accordance with the demands of the Sanhedrin.

For one offence the Sanhedrin could put to death, on their own authority, even a Rom citizen, namely, in the case of a Gentile passing the fence which divided the inner court of the Temple from that of the Gentiles (BJ, VI, ii, 4; Middōth 11 3; cf Acts 21 28). The only case of capital punishment in connection with the Sanhedrin in the NT is that of Our Lord. The stoning of Stephen (Acts 7 54 ff) was probably the illegal act of an enraged multitude.

5. Place and Time of Meeting

The Talmudic tradition names "the hall of hewn stone," which, according to Middōth 5 4, was on the south side of the great court, as the seat of the Great Sanhedrin (Pē'āh 2 6; 'Ēdhuyōth 7 4, et al.). But the last sittings of the Sanhedrin were held in the city outside the Temple area (Ṣanh. 41a; Shabbāth* 15a; Rō'sh ha-shānāh* 31a; 'Ăbhōdhāh zārāh* 8c*). Jos also mentions the place where the bouleutaí, "the councillors," met as the boulḗ, outside the Temple (BJ, V, iv, 2), and most probably he refers to these last sittings.

According to the Tōṣephtā' Ṣanh. 7 1, the Sanhedrin held its sittings from the time of the offering of the daily morning sacrifice till that of the evening sacrifice. There were no sittings on Sabbaths or feast days.

6. Procedure

The members of the Sanhedrin were arranged in a semicircle, so that they could see each other (Ṣanh. 4 3; Tōṣephtā' 8 1). The two notaries stood before them, whose duty it was to record the votes (see 3, above). The prisoner had to appear in humble attitude and dressed in mourning (Ant, XIV, ix, 4). A sentence of capital punishment could not be passed on the day of the trial. The decision of the judges had to be examined on the following day (Ṣanh. 4 1), except in the case of a person who misled the people, who could be tried and condemned the same day or in the night (Tōṣephtā' Ṣanh. 10). Because of this, cases which involved capital punishment were not tried on a Friday or on any day before a feast. A herald preceded the condemned one as he was led to the place of execution, and cried out: "N. the son of N. has been found guilty of death, etc. If anyone knows anything to clear him, let him come forward and declare it" (Ṣanh. 6 1). Near the place of execution the condemned man was asked to confess his guilt in order that he might partake in the world to come (ib; cf Lk 23 41–43).

LITERATURE.—Our knowledge about the Sanhedrin is based on three sources: the NT, Jos, and the Jewish tradition-literature (esp. Mish Ṣanhedhrīn and Makkōth, best ed, Strack, with Ger. tr, Schriften des Institutum Judaicum in Berlin, N. 38, Leipzig, 1910). See art. TALMUD.

Büchler, Das Synedrium in Jerusalem und das grosse Beth-din in der Quaderkammer des jerusalemischen Tempels, Vienna, 1902, a very interesting but not convincing work, where the author, in order to reconcile the two different sets of sources, tries to prove that the great Sanhedrin of the Talm is not identical with the Sanhedrin of Jos and the NT, but that there were two Sanhedrins in Jerus, the one of the NT and Jos being a political one, the other a religious one. He also thinks that Christ was seized, not by the Sanhedrin, but by the temple authorities.

PAUL LEVERTOFF

SANSANNAH, san-san'a (סַנְסַנָּה, ṣanṣannāh; Σανσάννα, Sansánna, or Σεθεννάκ, Sethennák): One of the uttermost cities in the Negeb of Judah (Josh 15 31), identical with Hazar-susah (Josh 19 5), one of the cities of Simeon, and almost certainly the same as Hazar-susim (1 Ch 4 31). It cannot be said to have been identified with any certainty, though Simsim, "a good-sized village with well and pool, surrounded by gardens and having a grove of olives to the north," has been suggested (PEF, III, 260, Sh XX).

SAPH, saf (סַף, ṣaph; B, Σάφ, Sáph, A, Σεφέ, Sephé): A Philistine, one of the four champions of the race of Rapha ("giant") who was slain by Sibbecai, one of David's heroes (2 S 21 18; 1 Ch 20 4). It is supposed by some that he was the son of the giant Goliath, but this is not proved. In 1 Ch 20 4, the same person is called "Sippai."

SAPHAT, sā'fat:

(1) A and Fritzsche, Σαφάτ, Saphát; omitted in B (and Swete); B^ab mg 'Ασάφ, Asáph: The eponym of a family which returned with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 9) = "Shephatiah" in Ezr 2 4; Neh 7 9.

(2) A, Σαφάτ, Saphát; B, Swete, and Fritzsche, Σαφάγ, Saphág; AV Sabat: One of the families of "the sons of the servants of Solomon" who returned with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 34); wanting in the ‖ Ezr 2 57; Neh 7 59.

SAPHATIAS, saf-a-tī'as (Σαφατίας, Saphatías, B, Σοφοτίας, Sophotías; omitted in A): Name of a family of returning exiles (1 Esd 8 34) = "Shephatiah" in Ezr 8 8. If Saphatias (1 Esd 8 34) = Saphat (5 9), as would appear, then part of the family went up with Zerubbabel and part with Ezra.

SAPHETH, sā'feth: AV = RV SAPHUTHI (q.v.).

SAPHIR, sā'fēr (שָׁפִיר, shāphīr). See SHAPHIR.

SAPHUTHI, saf'ū-thī, sa-fū'thi (A and Fritzsche, Σαφυθί, Saphuthí, B [and Swete], Σαφυεί, Saphueí; AV Sapheth): Name of one of the families of "the sons of the servants of Solomon" (1 Esd 5 33) = "Shephatiah" in Ezr 2 57; Neh 7 59.

SAPPHIRA, sa-fī'ra (שַׁפִּירָא, shappīrā'; Aram. for either "beautiful" or "sapphire"; Σαπφείρα, Sappheíra): Wife of Ananias (Acts 5 1–10). See ANANIAS, (1).

SAPPHIRE, saf'īr. See STONES, PRECIOUS.

SARABIAS, sar-a-bī'as (Σαραβίας, Sarabías): One of the Levites who taught and expounded the Law for Ezra (1 Esd 9 48) = "Sherebiah" in Neh 8 7, probably identical with the "Asebebias" in 1 Esd 8 47 (Ezr 8 18).

SARAH, sā'ra, SARAI, sā'rī:

(1) In Gen 17 15 the woman who up to that time has been known as Sarai (שָׂרַי, sāray; Σάρα, Sára) receives by Divine command the name Sarah (שָׂרָה, sārāh; Σάρρα, Sárra). (This last form in Gr preserves the ancient doubling of the r, lost in the Heb and the Eng. forms.)

The former name appears to be derived from the same root as Israel, if, indeed, Gen 32 28 is intended as an etymology of Israel. "She that strives," a contentious person, is a name that might be given to a child at birth (cf Hos 12 3.4, of Jacob), or later when the child's character developed; in Gen 16 6 and 21 10 a contentious character appears. Yet comparison with the history of her husband's name (see ABRAHAM) warns us not to operate solely upon the basis of the Heb language. Sarai was the name this woman brought with her from Mesopotamia. On the other hand there can be little doubt that the name Sarah, which she received when her son was promised, means "princess," for it is the fem. form of the extremely common title sar, used by the Semites to designate a ruler of greater or lesser rank.

In the verse following the one where this name is conferred, it is declared of Sarah that "kings of peoples shall be of her" (Gen 17 16).

We are introduced to Sarai in Gen 11 29. She is here mentioned as the wife that Abraham "took," while still in Ur of the Chaldees, that is, while among his kindred. It is immediately added that "Sarai was barren; she had no child." By this simple remark in the overture of his narrative, the writer sounds the motif that is to be developed in all the sequel. When the migration to Haran occurs, Sarai is named along with Abram and Lot as accompanying Terah. It has been held that the author (or authors) of ch 11 knew nothing of the relationship announced in 20 12. But there can be no proof of such ignorance, even on the assumption of diversity of authorship in the two passages.

Sarai's career as described in ch 11 was not dependent on her being the daughter of Terah. Terah had other descendants who did not accompany him. Her movements were determined by her being Abram's wife. It appears, however, that she was a daughter of Terah by a different mother from the mother of Abram. The language of 20 12 would indeed admit of her being Abram's niece, but the fact that there was but 10 years' difference between his age and hers (Gen 17 17) renders this hypothesis less probable. Marriage with half-sisters seems to have been not uncommon in antiquity (even in the OT cf 2 S 13 13).

This double relationship suggested to Abraham the expedient that he twice used when he lacked faith in God to protect his life and in cowardice sought his own safety at the price of his wife's honor. The first of these occasions was in the earlier period of their wanderings (ch 12). From Canaan they went down into Egypt. Sarai, though above 60 years of age according to the chronology of the sacred historian, made the impression on the Egyptians by her beauty that Abraham had anticipated, and the result was her transfer to the royal palace. But this was in direct contravention of the purpose of God for His own kingdom. The earthly majesty of Pharaoh had to bow before the Divine majesty, which plagued him and secured the stranger's exodus, thus foreshadowing those later plagues and that later exodus when Abraham's and Sarah's seed "spoiled the Egyptians."

We meet Sarah next in the narrative of the birth of Ishmael and of Isaac. Though 14 years separated the two births, they are closely associated in the story because of their logical continuity. Sarah's barrenness persisted. She was now far past middle life, even on a patriarchal scale of longevity, and there appeared no hope of her ever bearing that child who should inherit the promise of God. She therefore adopts the expedient of being "builded by" her personal slave, Hagar the Egyp (see Gen 16 2 m). That is, according to contemporary law and custom as witnessed by the CH (see Abraham, IV, 2), a son born of this woman would be the freeborn son and heir of Abraham and Sarah.

Such was in fact the position of Ishmael later. But the insolence of the maid aroused the vindictive jealousy of the mistress and led to a painful scene of unjustified expulsion. Hagar, however, returned at God's behest, humbled herself before Sarah, and bore Ishmael in his own father's house. Here he remained the sole and rightful heir, until the miracle of Isaac's birth disappointed all human expectations and resulted in the ultimate expulsion of Hagar and her son.

The change of name from Sarai to Sarah when Isaac was promised has already been noted. Sarah's laughter of incredulity when she hears the promise is of course associated with the origin of the name of Isaac, but it serves also to emphasize the miraculous character of his birth, coming as it does after his parents are both so "well stricken in age" as to make parenthood seem an absurdity.

Before the birth of this child of promise, however, Sarah is again exposed, through the cowardice of her husband, to dishonor and ruin. Abimelech, king of Gerar, desiring to be allied by marriage with a man of Abraham's power, sends for Sarah, whom he knows only as Abraham's sister, and for the second time she takes her place in the harem of a prince. But the Divine promise is not to be thwarted, even by persistent human weakness and sin. In a dream God reveals to Abimelech the true state of the case, and Sarah is restored to her husband with an indemnity. Thereupon the long-delayed son is born, the jealous mother secures the expulsion of Hagar and Ishmael, and her career comes to a close at the age of 127, at Hebron, long time her home. The grief and devotion of Abraham are broadly displayed in ch 23, in which he seeks and obtains a burying-place for his wife. She is thus the first to be interred in that cave of the field of Machpelah, which was to be the common resting-place of the fathers and mothers of the future Israel.

The character of Sarah is of mingled light and shade. On the one hand we have seen that lapse from faith which resulted in the birth of Ishmael, and that lack of self-control and charity which resulted in a quarrel with Abraham, an act of injustice to Hagar, and the disinheriting of Ishmael. Yet on the other hand we see in Sarah, as the NT writers point out (He 11 11; 1 Pet 3 6), one who through a long life of companionship with Abraham shared his hope in God, his faith in the promises, and his power to become God's agent for achieving what was humanly impossible. In fact, to Sarah is ascribed a sort of spiritual maternity, correlative with Abraham's position as "father of the faithful"; for all women are declared to be the (spiritual) daughters of Sarah, who like her are adorned in "the hidden man of the heart," and who are "doers of good" and "fearers of no terror" (1 Pet l.c., literally rendered). That in spite of her outbreak about Hagar and Ishmael she was in general "in subjection to her husband" and of "a meek and quiet spirit," appears from her husband's genuine grief at her decease, and still more clearly from her son's prolonged mourning for her (Gen 24 67; cf 17 17 and 23 1 with 25 20). And He who maketh even the wrath of man to praise Him used even Sarah's jealous anger to accomplish His purpose that "the son of the freewoman," Isaac, "born through promise," should alone inherit that promise (Gal 4 22–31).

Apart from the three NT passages already cited, Sarah is alluded to only in Isa 51 2 ("Sarah that bare you," as the mother of the nation), in Rom 4 19 ("the deadness of Sarah's womb"), and in Rom 9 9, where God's promise in Gen 18 10 is quoted. Yet her existence and her history are of course presupposed wherever allusion is made to the stories of Abraham and of Isaac.

To many modern critics Sarah supplies, by her name, a welcome argument in support of the mythical view of Abraham. She has been held to be the local numen to whom the cave near Hebron was sacred; or the deity whose consort was worshipped in Arabia under the title Dusares, i.e. Husband-of-Sarah; or, the female associate of Sin the moon-god, worshipped at Haran. On these views the student will do well to consult Baethgen, Beiträge, 94, 157, and, for the most recent point of view, Gressmann's art., "Sage und Geschichte in den Patriarchenerzählungen," ZATW, 1910, and Eerdmans, Alttestamentliche Studien, II, 13.

SARAIAS, sa-rā′yas, sa-rī′as (Σαραίας, Saraías, Lat Sareus):

(1) = Seraiah, the high priest in the reign of Zedekiah (1 Esd 5 5, cf 1 Ch 6 14).

(2) Sareus the father of Ezra (2 Esd 1 1) = "Seraiah" in Ezr 7 1, sometimes identified with Saraias under (1). He is probably identical with the "Azaraias" of 1 Esd 8 1.

(3) AV=RV "Azaraias" (1 Esd 8 1).

SARAMEL, sar′a-mel: AV=RV Asaramel (q.v.).

SARAPH, sā′raf, sä′raf (שָׂרָף, sāraph, "noble one"; cf שָׂרַף, sārāph, "burn," "shine"): A descendant of Judah through Shelah (1 Ch 4 22).

SARCHEDONUS, sär-ked′ō-nus (B א, Σαχερδονός, Sacherdonós, A, Σαχερδάν, Sacherdán, but Σαχερδονοσός, Sacherdonosós in Tob 1 22): An incorrect spelling, both in AV and RV, for Sacherdonus in Tob 1 21 f, another form of Esar-haddon.

SARDEUS, sär-dē′us: AV=RV Zardeus (q.v.).

SARDIN(E), sär′din, sär′dīn, SARDIUS. See Stones, Precious.

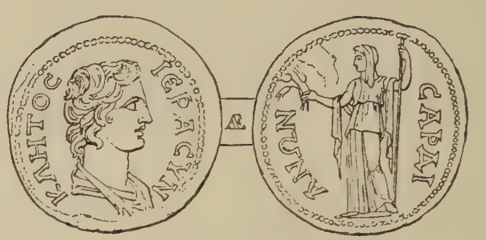
SARDIS, sär′dis (Σάρδεις, Sárdeis): Sardis is of special interest to the student of Herodotus and Xenophon, for there Artaphernes, the brother of Darius, lived, and from there Xerxes invaded Greece and Cyrus marched against his brother Artaxerxes; it is also of interest to the student of early Christian history as the home of one of the Seven Churches of Rev (1 11; 3 1 ff). It was moreover one of the oldest and most important cities of Asia Minor, and until 549 BC, the capital of the kingdom of Lydia. It stood on the northern slope of Mt. Tmolus; its acropolis occupied one of the spurs of the mountain. At the base flowed the river Pactolus which served as a moat, rendering the city practically impregnable. Through the failure to watch, however, the acropolis had been successfully scaled in 549 BC by a Median soldier, and in 218 by a Cretan (cf Rev 3 2.3). Because of its strength during the Pers period, the satraps here made their homes. However, the city was burned by the Ionians in 501 BC, but it was quickly rebuilt and regained its importance. In 334 BC it surrendered to Alexander the Great who gave it independence, but its period of independence was brief, for 12 years later in 322 BC it was taken by Antigonus. In 301 BC, it fell into the possession of the Seleucidan kings who made it the residence of their governor. It became free again in 190 BC, when it formed a part of the empire of Pergamos, and later of the Rom province of Asia. In 17 AD, when it was destroyed by an earthquake, the Rom emperor Tiberius remitted the taxes of the people and rebuilt the city, and in his honor the citizens of that and of neighboring towns erected a large monument, but Sardis never recovered its former importance (cf Rev 3 12). Again in 295 AD, after the Rom province of Asia was broken up, Sardis became the capital of Lydia, and during the early Christian age it was the home of a bishop. The city continued to flourish until 1402, when it was so completely destroyed by Tamerlane that it was never rebuilt. Among the ruins there now stands a small village called Sert, a corruption of its ancient name. The ruins may be reached by rail from Smyrna, on the way to Philadelphia.

The ancient city was noted for its fruits and wool, and for its temple of the goddess Cybele, whose worship resembled that of Diana of Ephesus. Its wealth was also partly due to the gold which was found in the sand of the river Pactolus, and it was here that gold and silver coins were first struck. During the Rom period its coins formed a beautiful series, and are found in abundance by the peasants who till the surrounding fields. The ruins of the buildings which stood at the base of the hill have now been nearly buried by the dirt washed down from above. The hill upon which the acropolis stood measures 950 ft. high: the triple walls still surround it. The more imposing of the ruins are on the lower slope of the hill, and among them the temple of Cybele is the most interesting, yet only two of its many stone columns are still standing. Equally imposing is the necropolis of the city, which is at a distance of two hours' ride from Sert, S. of the Gygaean lake. The modern name of the necropolis is Bin Tepe or Thousand Mounds, because of the large group of great mounds in which the kings and nobles were buried. Many of the mounds were long ago excavated and plundered.



Coin of Sardis.

We quote the following from the Missionary Herald (Boston, Mass., August, 1911, pp. 361–62):

Dr. C. C. Tracy, of Marsovan, has made a visit to ancient Sardis and observed the work of his countryman, Professor Butler, of Princeton University, who is uncovering the ruins of that famous city of the past. Already rich "finds" have been made; among them portions of a temple of Artemis, indicating a building of the same stupendous character as those at Ephesus and Baalbec, and a necropolis from whose tombs were unearthed three thousand relics, including utensils, ornaments of gold and precious stones, mirrors, etc. What chiefly impressed Dr. Tracy was the significance of those "Seven Churches of Asia," of which Sardis held one. "When I think of the myriads of various nationality and advanced civilization for whose evangelization these churches were responsible, the messages to the Christian communities occupying the splendid strategic centers fill me with awe. While established amid the splendors of civilization, they were set as candlesticks in the midst of gross spiritual darkness. Did they fulfil their mission?"

One of Dr. Butler's recoveries is the marble throne of the Bishop of Sardis; looking upon it the message to Sardis recurs to mind. A fact of current history quickened the visitor's appreciation of the word to "the angel" of that church. "Yonder among the mountains overhanging Sardis there is a robber gang led by the notorious Chakirjali. He rules in the mountains; no government force can take him. Again and again he swoops down like an eagle out of the sky, in one quarter of the region or another. From time immemorial these mountains have been the haunts of robbers; very likely it was so when Rev was written, 'I will come upon thee as a thief.' In each case the message was addressed to 'the angel of the church.' Over every church in the world there is a spirit hovering, as it were—a spirit representing that church and by whose name it can be addressed. The messages are as vital as they were at the first. 'He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches.' "

SARDIUS, sär′di-us. See Stones, Precious.

SARDONYX, sär′dō-niks. See Stones, Precious.

SAREPTA, sa-rep′ta (Σάρεπτα, Sárepta): The name in Lk 4 26 AV, following the Gr, of the Phoen town to which Elijah was sent in the time of the great famine, in order to save the lives of a widow and her son (1 K 17 9.10). RV adopts the form of the name based upon the Heb, and as found in the OT: Zarephath (q.v.).

SARID, sā′rid (שָׂרִיד, sārīdh; B, 'Εσεδεκγωλά, Esedekgōlá, Σεδδούκ, Seddoúk, A, Σαρθίδ, Sarthíd, Σαρίδ, Saríd): A place on the southern border of Zebulun to the W. of Chisloth-tabor (Josh 19 10.12). It is mentioned but not identified in Onom. Probably we should read "Sadid," and in that case may with Conder locate it at Tell Shaddū, an artificial mound with some modern ruins and good springs, which stands on the plain, about 5 miles W. of Iksāl.

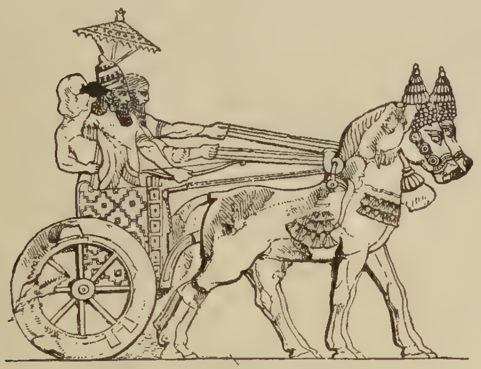
SARGON, sär′gon (722–705 BC): The name of this ruler is written סַרְגּוֹן, ṣargōn, in the OT, Shar-ukîn in the cuneiform inscriptions, Ἀρνά, Arná, in the LXX, and Ἀρκεανος, Arkeanos, in the Ptolemaic Canon. Sargon is mentioned but once by name in the OT (Isa 20 1), when he sent his Tartan (turtannu) against Ashdod, but he is referred to in 2 K 17 6 as "the king of Assyria" who carried Israel into captivity.

Shalmaneser V had laid siege to Samaria and besieged it three years. But shortly before or very soon after its capitulation, Sargon, perhaps being responsible for the king's death, overthrew the dynasty, and in his annals credited himself with the capture of the city and the deportation of its inhabitants. Whether he assumed the name of the famous ancient founder of the Accad dynasty is not known.

Sargon at the beginning of his reign was confronted with a serious situation in Babylon. Merodach-baladan of Kaldû, who paid tribute to previous rulers, on the change of dynasty had himself proclaimed king, New Year's Day, 721 BC. At Dur-ilu, Sargon fought with the forces of Merodach-baladan and his ally Khumbanigash of Elam, but although he claimed a victory the result was apparently indecisive. Rebellions followed in other parts of the kingdom.



Sargon in His War Chariot.

In 720 Ilu-bi'di (or Yau-bi'di), king of Hamath, formed a coalition against Sargon with Hanno of Gaza, Sib'u of Egypt, and with the cities Arpad, Ṣimirra, Damascus and Samaria. He claims that Ṣib'u fled, and that he captured and flayed Ilu-bi'di, burned Ḳarḳar, and carried Hanno captive to Assyria. After destroying Rapihu, he carried away 9,033 inhabitants to Assyria.

In the following year Ararat was invaded and the Hittite Carchemish fell before his armies. The territory of Rusas, king of Ararat, as well as a part of Melitene became Assyr provinces.

In 710 Sargon directed his attention to Merodach-baladan, who no longer enjoyed the support of Elam, and whose rule over Babylon had not been popular with his subjects. He was driven out from Babylon and also from his former capital Bît-Yakîn, and Sargon had himself crowned as the shakkanak of Babylon.

In 706 the new city called Dûr-Sharrukîn was dedicated as his residence. A year later he was murdered. It was during his reign that the height of Assyr ascendancy had been reached.

SARON, sā′ron (Σάρων, Sárōn): AV; Gr form of Sharon (Acts 9 35).

SAROTHIE, sa-rō′thi-ē (A, Σαρωθιέ, Sarōthié, B and Swete, Σαρωθεί, Sarōthei): Name of a family of "the sons of the servants of Solomon" who returned with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 34); it is wanting in the ‖ lists in Ezr 2 57; Neh 7 59.

SARSECHIM, sär′sĕ-kim, sär-sē′kim (שַׂרְסְכִים, sarṣᵉkhīm): A prince of Nebuchadnezzar, present at the taking of Jerus by Nebuchadnezzar in the 11th year of Zedekiah (Jer 39 3). The VSS with their various readings—"Nabousachar," "Nabousarach," "Sarsacheim"—point to a corrupt text. The best emendation is the reading "Nᵉbhōshazibhon" (= Nabûšêzib-anni, "Nebo delivers me"); this is based on the reading in Jer 39 13.

SARUCH, sā′ruk (Σαρούχ, Saroúch, Σερούχ, Seroúch): AV; Gr form of Serug (thus Lk 3 35 RV).

I. Definition.—A created but superhuman, personal, evil, world-power, represented in Scripture as the adversary both of God and men.

II. Scriptural Facts concerning Satan.—The most important of these are the Heb and Gr equivalents noticed above.

1. Names of Satan

These words are used in the general sense justified by their etymological significance. It is applied even to Jeh Himself (Nu 22 22.32; cf 1 S 29 4; 2 S 19 22; Ps 109 6, etc). The word "Satan" is used 24 t in the OT. In Job (1 6 f) and Zec (3 1 f) it has the prefixed definite article. In all cases but one when the art. is omitted it is used in a general sense. This one exception is 1 Ch 21 1 (cf 2 S 24 1), where the word is generally conceded to be used as a proper name. This meaning is fixed in NT times. We are thus enabled to note in the term "Satan" (and Devil) the growth of a word from a general term to an appellation and later to a proper name. All the other names of Satan save only these two are descriptive titles. In addition to these two principal names a number of others deserve specific enumeration. Tempter (Mt 4 5; 1 Thess 3 5); Beelzebub (Mt 12 24); Enemy (Mt 13 39); Evil One (Mt 13 19.38; 1 Jn 2 13.14; 3 12, and particularly 5 18); Belial (2 Cor 6 15); Adversary (ἀντίδικος, antídikos), (1 Pet 5 8); Deceiver (lit. "the one who deceives") (Rev 12 9); Dragon (Great) (Rev 12 3); Father of Lies (Jn 8 44); Murderer (Jn 8 44); Sinner (1 Jn 3 8)—these are isolated references occurring from 1 to 3 t each. In the vast majority of passages (70 out of 83) either Satan or Devil is used.

2. Character of Satan

Satan is consistently represented in the NT as the enemy both of God and man. The popular notion is that Satan is the enemy of man and active in misleading and cursing humanity because of his intense hatred and opposition to God. Mt 13 39 would seem to point in this direction, but if one were to venture an opinion in a region where there are not enough facts to warrant a conviction, it would be that the general tenor of Scripture indicates quite the contrary, namely, that Satan's jealousy and hatred of men has led him into antagonism to God and, consequently, to goodness. The fundamental moral description of Satan is given by Our Lord when He describes Satan as the "evil one" (Mt 13 19.38; cf Isa's description of Jeh as the "Holy One," 1 4 and often); that is, the one whose nature and will are given to evil. Moral evil is his controlling attribute. It is evident that this description could not be applied to Satan as originally created. Ethical evil cannot be concreated. It is the creation of each free will for itself. We are not told in definite terms how Satan became the evil one, but certainly it could be by no other process than a fall, whereby, in the mystery of free personality, an evil will takes the place of a good one.

3. Works of Satan

The world-wide and age-long works of Satan are to be traced to one predominant motive. He hates both God and man and does all that in him lies to defeat God's plan of grace and to establish and maintain a kingdom of evil, in the seduction and ruin of mankind. The balance and sanity of the Bible is nowhere more strikingly exhibited than in its treatment of the work of Satan. Not only is the Bible entirely free from the extravagances of popular Satanology, which is full of absurd stories concerning the appearances, tricks, and transformations of Satan among men, but it exhibits a dependable accuracy and consistency of statement which is most reassuring. Almost nothing is said concerning Satanic agency other than wicked men who mislead other men. In the controversy with His opponents concerning exorcism (Mk 3 22 f and ‖'s) Our Lord rebuts their slanderous assertion that He is in league with Satan by the simple proposition that Satan does not work against himself. But in so saying He does far more than refute this slander. He definitely aligns the Bible against the popular idea that a man may make a definite and conscious personal alliance with Satan for any purpose whatever. The agent of Satan is always a victim. Also the hint contained in this discussion that Satan has a kingdom, together with a few other not very definite allusions, are all that we have to go upon in this direction. Nor are we taught anywhere that Satan is able to any extent to introduce disorder into the physical universe or directly operate in the lives of men. It is true that in Lk 13 16 Our Lord speaks of the woman who was bowed over as one "whom Satan has bound, lo, these eighteen years," and that in 2 Cor 12 7 Paul speaks of his infirmity as a "messenger of Satan sent to buffet him." Paul also speaks (1 Thess 2 18) of Satan's hindering him from visiting the church at Thessalonica. A careful study of these related passages (together with the prologue of Job) will reveal the fact that Satan's direct agency in the physical world is very limited. Satan may be said to be implicated in all the disasters and woes of human life, in so far as they are more or less directly contingent upon sin (see particularly He 2 14). On the contrary, it is perfectly evident that Satan's power consists principally in his ability to deceive. It is interesting and characteristic that according to the Bible Satan is fundamentally a liar and his kingdom is a kingdom founded upon lies and deceit. The doctrine of Satan therefore corresponds in every important particular to the general Bib. emphasis upon truth. "The truth shall make you free" (Jn 8 32)—this is the way of deliverance from the power of Satan.

Now it would seem that to make Satan preëminently the deceiver would make man an innocent victim and thus relax the moral issue. But according to the Bible man is particeps criminis in the process of his own deception. He is deceived only because he ceases to love the truth and comes first to love and then to believe a lie (2 Cor 1 10). This really goes to the very bottom of the problem of temptation. Men are not tempted by evil, per se, but by a good which can be obtained only at the cost of doing wrong. The whole power of sin, at least in its beginnings, consists in the sway of the fundamental falsehood that any good is really attainable by wrongdoing. Since temptation consists in this attack upon the moral sense, man is constitutionally guarded against deceit, and is morally culpable in allowing himself to be deceived. The temptation of Our Lord Himself throws the clearest possible light upon the methods ascribed to Satan. The temptation was addressed to Christ's consciousness of Divine sonship; it was a deceitful attack emphasizing the good, minimizing or covering up the evil; indeed, twisting evil into good. It was a deliberate, malignant attempt to obscure the truth and induce to evil through the acceptance of falsehood. The attack broke against a loyalty to truth which made self-deceit, and consequently deceit from without, impossible. The lie was punctured by the truth and the temptation lost its power (see TEMPTATION OF CHRIST). This incident reveals one of the methods of Satan—by immediate suggestion as in the case of Judas (Lk 22 3; Jn 13 2.27). Sometimes, however, and, perhaps, most frequently, Satan's devices (2 Cor 2 11) include human agents. Those who are given over to evil and who persuade others to evil are children and servants of Satan (see Mt 16 23; Mk 8 33; Lk 4 8; Jn 6 70; 8 44; Acts 13 10; 1 Jn 3 8). Satan also works through persons and institutions supposed to be on the side of right but really evil. Here the same ever-present and active falseness and deceit are exhibited. When he is called "the god of this world" (2 Cor 4 4) it would seem to be intimated that he has the power to clothe himself in apparently Divine attributes. He also makes himself an angel of light by presenting advocates of falsehood in the guise of apostles of truth (2 Cor 11 13.15; 1 Jn 4 1; 2 Thess 2 9; Rev 12 9; 19 20). In the combination of passages here brought together, it is clearly indicated that Satan is the instigator and fomenter of that spirit of lawlessness which exhibits itself as hatred both of truth and right, and which has operated so widely and so disastrously in human life.

4. History of Satan

The history of Satan, including that phase of it which remains to be realized, can be set forth only along the most general lines. He belongs to the angelic order of beings. He is by nature one of the sons of Elohim (Job 1 6). He has fallen, and by virtue of his personal forcefulness has become the leader of the anarchic forces of wickedness. As a free being he has merged his life in evil and has become altogether and hopelessly evil. As a being of high intelligence he has gained great power and has exercised a wide sway over other beings. As a created being the utmost range of his power lies within the compass of that which is permitted. It is, therefore, hedged in by the providential government of God and essentially limited. The Bib. emphasis upon the element of falsehood in the career of Satan might be taken to imply that his kingdom may be less in extent than appears. At any rate, it is confined to the cosmic sphere and to a limited portion of time. It is also doomed. In the closely related passages 2 Pet 2 4 and Jude ver 6 it is affirmed that God cast the angels, when they sinned, down to Tartarus and committed them to pits of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment. This both refers to the constant Divine control of these insurgent forces and also points to their final and utter destruction. The putting of Satan in bonds is evidently both constant and progressive. The essential limitation of the empire of evil and its ultimate overthrow are foreshadowed in the Book of Job (chs 38–41), where Jeh's power extends even to the symbolized spirit of evil.

According to synoptic tradition, Our Lord in the crisis of temptation immediately following the baptism (Mt 4 and ‖) met and for the time conquered Satan as His own personal adversary. This preliminary contest did not close the matter, but was the earnest of a complete victory. According to Lk (10 18), when the Seventy returned from their mission flushed with victory over the powers of evil, Jesus said: 'I saw Satan fall [not "fallen"; see Plummer, "Lk," ICC, in loc.] as lightning from heaven.' In every triumph over the powers of evil Christ beheld in vision the downfall of Satan. In connection with the coming of the Hellenists who wished to see Him, Jesus asserted (Jn 12 31), "Now is the judgment of this world: now shall the prince of this world be cast out." In view of His approaching passion He says again (Jn 14 30), "The prince of the world cometh: and he hath nothing in me." Once again in connection with the promised advent of the Spirit, Jesus asserted (Jn 16 11) that the Spirit would convict the world of judgment, "because the prince of this world hath been judged." In He (2 14.15) it is said that Christ took upon Himself human nature in order "that through death he might bring to nought him that had the power of death, that is, the devil." In 1 Jn 3 8 it is said, "To this end was the Son of God manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil." In Rev 12 9 it is asserted, in connection with Christ's ascension, that Satan was cast down to the earth and his angels with him. According to the passage immediately following (12 10–12), this casting down was not complete or final in the sense of extinguishing his activities altogether, but it involves the potential and certain triumph of God and His saints and the equally certain defeat of Satan. In 1 Jn 2 13 the young men are addressed as those who "have overcome the evil one." In Rev 20 the field of the future is covered in the assertion that Satan is "bound a thousand years"; then loosed "for a little time," and then finally "cast into the lake of fire."

A comparison of these passages will convince the careful student that while we cannot construct a definite chronological program for the career of Satan, we are clear in the chief points. He is limited, judged, condemned, imprisoned, reserved for judgment from the beginning. The outcome is certain though the process may be tedious and slow. The victory of Christ is the defeat of Satan; first, for Himself as Leader and Saviour of men (Jn 14 30); then, for believers (Lk 22 31; Acts 26 18; Rom 16 20; Jas 4 7; 1 Jn 2 13; 5 4.18); and, finally, for the whole world (Rev 20 10). The work of Christ has already destroyed the empire of Satan.

III. General Considerations.—There are, no doubt, serious difficulties in the way of accepting the doctrine of a personal, superhuman, evil power as Satan is described to be. It is doubtful, however, whether these difficulties may not be due, at least in part, to a misunderstanding of the doctrine and certain of its implications. In addition, it must be acknowledged, that whatever difficulties there may be in the teaching, they are exaggerated and, at the same time, not fairly met by the vague and irrational skepticism which denies without investigation. There are difficulties involved in any view of the world. To say the least, some problems are met by the view of a superhuman, evil world-power. In this section certain general considerations are urged with a view to lessening difficulties keenly felt by some minds. Necessarily, certain items gathered in the foregoing section are here emphasized again.

1. Scripture Doctrine of Satan Not Systematized

The Scriptural doctrine of Satan is nowhere systematically developed. For materials in this field we are shut up to scattered and incidental references. These passages, which even in the aggregate are not numerous, tell us what we need to know concerning the nature, history, kingdom and works of Satan, but offer scant satisfaction to the merely speculative temper. The comparative lack of development in this field is due partly to the fact that the Bib. writers are primarily interested in God, and only secondarily in the powers of darkness; and partly to the fact that in the Bible doctrine waits upon fact. Hence the malign and sinister figure of the Adversary is gradually outlined against the light of God's holiness as progressively revealed in the providential world-process which centers in Christ. It is a significant fact that the statements concerning Satan become numerous and definite only in the NT. The daylight of the Christian revelation was necessary in order to uncover the lurking foe, dimly disclosed but by no means fully known in the earlier revelation. The disclosure of Satan is, in form at least, historical, not dogmatic.

2. Satan and God

In the second place, the relationship of Satan to God, already emphasized, must be kept constantly in mind. The doctrine of Satan merges in the general doctrine concerning angels (see ANGELS). It has often been pointed out that the personal characteristics of angels are very little insisted upon. They are known chiefly by their functions: merged, on the one hand, in their own offices, and, on the other, in the activities of God Himself.

In the OT Satan is not represented as a fallen and malignant spirit, but as a servant of Jeh, performing a Divine function and having his place in the heavenly train. In the ‖ accounts of David's numbering of Israel (1 S 24 1; 1 Ch 21 1) the tempting of David is attributed both to Jeh and Satan. The reason for this is either that 'the temptation of men is also a part of his providence,' or that in the interval between the documents the personality of the tempter has more clearly emerged. In this case the account in Ch would nearly approximate the NT teaching. In the Book of Job (1 6), however, Satan is among the Sons of God and his assaults upon Job are Divinely permitted. In Zec (3 1.2) Satan is also a servant of Jeh. In both these passages there is the hint of opposition between Jeh and Satan. In the former instance Satan assails unsuccessfully the character of one whom Jeh honors; while in the latter Jeh explicitly rebukes Satan for his attitude toward Israel (see G. A. Smith, BTP, II, 316 f). The unveiling of Satan as a rebellious world-power is reserved for the NT, and with this fuller teaching the symbolic treatment of temptation in Gen is to be connected. There is a sound pedagogical reason, from the viewpoint of revelation, for this earlier withholding of the whole truth concerning Satan. In the early stages of religious thinking it would seem to be difficult, if not impossible, to hold the sovereignty of God without attributing to His agency those evils in the world which are more or less directly connected with judgment and punishment (cf Isa 45 7; Am 3 6). The OT sufficiently emphasizes man's responsibility for his own evil deeds, but superhuman evil is brought upon him from above. "When wilful souls have to be misled, the spirit who does so, as in Ahab's case, comes from above" (G. A. Smith, op. cit., 317). The progressive revelation of God's character and purpose, which more and more imperatively demands that the origin of moral evil, and consequently natural evil, must be traced to the created will in opposition to the Divine, leads to the ultimate declaration that Satan is a morally fallen being to whose conquest the Divine Power in history is pledged. There is, also, the distinct possibility that in the significant transition from the Satan of the OT to that of the NT we have the outlines of a biography and an indication of the way by which the angels fell.

3. Satan Essentially Limited

A third general consideration, based upon data given in the earlier section, should be urged in the same connection. In the NT delineation of Satan, his limitations are clearly set forth. He is superhuman, but not in any sense Divine. His activities are cosmic, but not universal or transcendent. He is a created being. His power is definitely circumscribed. He is doomed to final destruction as a world-power. His entire career is that of a secondary and dependent being who is permitted a certain limited scope of power—a time-lease of activity (Lk 4 6).

4. Conclusions

These three general considerations have been grouped in this way because they dispose of three objections which are current against the doctrine of Satan.

(1) The first is, that it is mythological in origin. That it is not dogmatic is a priori evidence against this hypothesis. Mythology is primitive dogma. There is no evidence of a theodicy or philosophy of evil in the Bib. treatment of Satan. Moreover, while the Scriptural doctrine is unsystematic in form, it is rigidly limited in scope and everywhere essentially consistent. Even in the Apocalypse, where naturally more scope is allowed to the imagination, the same essential ideas appear. The doctrine of Satan corresponds, item for item, to the intellectual saneness and ethical earnestness of the Bib. world-view as a whole. It is, therefore, not mythological. The restraint of chastened imagination, not the extravagance of mythological fancy, is in evidence throughout the entire Bib. treatment of the subject. Even the use of terms current in mythology (as perhaps Gen 3 1.13.14; Rev 12 7–9; cf 1 Pet 5 8) does not imply more than a literary clothing of Satan in attributes commonly ascribed to malignant and disorderly forces.

(2) The second objection is that the doctrine is due to the influence of Pers dualism (see Persian Religion; Zoroastrianism). The answer to this is plain, on the basis of facts already adduced. The Bib. doctrine of Satan is not dualistic. Satan's empire had a beginning, it will have a definite and permanent end. Satan is God's great enemy in the cosmic sphere, but he is God's creation, exists by Divine will, and his power is relatively no more commensurate with God's than that of men. Satan awaits his doom. Weiss says (concerning the NT representation of conflict between God and the powers of evil): "There lies in this no Manichaean dualism, ... but only the deepest experience of the work of redemption as the definite destruction of the power from which all sin in the world of men proceeds" (Bib. Theol. NT, ET, II, 272; cf G. A. Smith, op. cit., II, 318).

(3) The third objection is practically the same as the second, but addressed directly to the doctrine itself, apart from the question of its origin, namely, that it destroys the unity of God. The answer to this also is a simple negative. To some minds the reality of created wills is dualistic and therefore untenable. But a true doctrine of unity makes room for other wills than God's—namely of those beings upon whom God has bestowed freedom. Herein stands the doctrine of sin and Satan. The doctrine of Satan no more militates against the unity of God than the idea, so necessary to morality and religion alike, of other created wills set in opposition to God's. Just as the conception of Satan merges, in one direction, in the general doctrine of angels, so, in the other, it blends with the broad and difficult subject of evil (cf "Satan," HDB, IV, 412*a*).

Literature.—All standard works on Bib. Theology, as well as Dicts., etc, treat with more or less thoroughness the doctrine of Satan. The German theologians of the more evangelical type, such as Weiss, Lange, Martensen (Danish), Dorner, while exhibiting a tendency toward excessive speculation, discern the deeper aspects of the doctrine. Of monographs known to the writer none are to be recommended without qualification. It is a subject on which the Bible is its own best interpreter.

SATAN, DEPTHS OF (τὰ βαθέα τοῦ Σατανᾶ, tá bathéa toú Sataná): Found in Rev 2 24, and has reference to false teaching at Thyatira. It is a question (that perhaps may not be decided) whether tou Satana, "of Satan," represents the claim of the false teachers, or is thrown in by the Lord. Did those false teachers claim to know "the depths" of Satan? Or was it that they claimed to know "the depths" of Deity, and the Lord said it was rather "the depths of Satan"? In either case the antithesis to "depths of Satan" is "depths of God," as referred to in Rom 11 33; 1 Cor 2 10.

SATAN, SYNAGOGUE OF: The expression occurs neither in the Heb nor in the Gr of the OT, nor in Apoc. Three passages in the OT and one in Apoc suggest the idea conveyed in the expression. In Nu 14 27.35, Jeh expresses His wrath against "the evil congregation" (LXX συναγωγὴ πονηρά, sunagōgḗ ponērá) which He threatens to consume in the wilderness. In Ps 21 (22) 16, we find, "A company of evil doers [LXX συναγωγὴ πονηρευομένων, sunagōgḗ ponēreuoménōn] have inclosed me." In Sir 16 6, we read, "In the congregation of sinners [LXX συναγωγὴ ἁμαρτωλῶν, sunagōgḗ hamartōlôn] shall a fire be kindled."

Only in the NT occurs the phrase "synagogue of Satan," and here only twice (Rev 2 9; 3 9). Three observations are evident as to who constituted "the synagogue of Satan" in Smyrna and Philadelphia. (1) They claimed to be Jews, i.e. they were descendants of Abraham, and so laid claim to the blessings promised by Jeh to him and his seed. (2) But they are not regarded by John as real Jews, i.e. they are not the genuine Israel of God (the same conclusion as Paul reached in Rom 2 28). (3) They are persecutors of the Christians in Smyrna. The Lord "knows their blasphemy," their sharp denunciations of Christ and Christians. They claim to be the true people of God, but really they are "the synagogue of Satan." The gen. Σατανᾶ, Sataná, is probably the possessive gen. These Jewish persecutors, instead of being God's people, are the "assembly of Satan," i.e. Satan's people.

In Polyc., Mar. xvii.2 (c 155 AD) the Jews of Smyrna were still persecutors of Christians and were conspicuous in demanding and planning the martyrdom of Polycarp the bishop of Smyrna, the same city in which the revelator calls persecuting Jews "the assembly of Satan."

In the 2d cent., in an inscription (CIJ, 3148) describing the classes of population in Smyrna, we find the expression οἱ ποτὲ Ἰουδαῖοι, hoi poté Ioudaíoi, which Mommsen thinks means "Jews who had abandoned their religion," but which Ramsay says "probably means those who formerly were the nation of the Jews, but have lost the legal standing of a separate people."

Literature.—Ramsay, The Seven Churches of Asia, ch xii; Swete, The Apocalypse of St. John, 31, 32; Polycarp, Mar. xiii ff.17.2; Mommsen, Historische Zeitschrift, XXXVII, 417.

SATHRABUZANES, sath-ra-bū′za-nēz, sath-ra-bû-zā′nēz (Σαθραβουζάνης, Sathrabouzánēs): In 1 Esd 6 3.7.27 = "Shethar-bozenai" in Ezr 5 3.6; 6 6.13.

SATISFACTION, sat-is-fak′shun: Occurs twice in AV (Nu 35 31.32) as a rendering of the Heb kōpher (RV "ransom"). It means a price paid as compensation for a life, and the passage cited is a prohibition against accepting such, in case of murder, or for the return of the manslayer. Such compensation was permitted in ancient justice among many peoples. Cf ποινή, poinḗ, which Liddell and Scott define as "properly quit-money for blood spilt, the fine paid by the slayer to the kinsman of the slain, as a ransom from all consequences." The same custom prevailed among Teutonic peoples, as seen in the Ger. Wergeld and Old Eng. wergild. The Heb laws of the OT permit it only in the case of a man or woman gored to death by an ox (Ex 21 30–32).

SATRAPS, sā′traps, sat′raps (אֲחַשְׁדַּרְפְּנִים, 'ăḥashdarpenīm, Ezr 8 36; Est 3 12; 8 9; 9 3, AV "lieutenants"; Dnl 3 2.3.27; 6 1 ff, AV "princes"): The viceroys or vassal rulers to whom was intrusted the government of the provinces in the Pers empire. The word answers to the Old Pers khshathrapāvan, "protectors of the realm."

SATYR, sat′ẽr, sā′tẽr (שָׂעִיר, sāʿīr, lit. "he-goat"; cf שָׂעִר, sāʿir, "hairy" [Gen 27 11, of Esau], and Arab. شَعْر, sha'r, "hair"; pl. שְׂעִירִים, seʿīrīm): For seʿīrīm in Lev 17 7 and 2 Ch 11 15, AV has "devils," RV "he-goats," ERVm "satyrs," LXX τοῖς ματαίοις, toís mataíois, "vain things." For seʿīrīm in Isa 13 21, AV and ERV have "satyrs," ERVm "he-goats," ARV "wild goats," LXX δαιμόνια, daimónia, "demons." For sāʿīr in Isa 34 14, AV and ERV have "satyr," ERVm "he-goat," ARV "wild goat." LXX has ἕτερος πρὸς τὸν ἕτερον, héteros prós tón héteron, "one to another," referring to daimonia, which here stands for çīyīm, "wild beasts of the desert."

The text of ARV in these passages is as follows: Lev 17 7, "And they shall no more sacrifice their sacrifices unto the he-goats, after which they play the harlot"; 2 Ch 11 15, "And he [Jeroboam] appointed him priests for the high places, and for the he-goats, and for the calves which he had made"; Isa 13 21 f (of Babylon), "But wild beasts of the desert [çīyīm] shall lie there; and their houses shall be full of doleful creatures ['ōḥīm]; and ostriches [benōth ya'ănāh] shall dwell there, and wild goats [se'īrīm] shall dance there. And wolves ['īyīm] shall cry in their castles, and jackals [tannīm] in the pleasant palaces"; Isa 34 11.13.14.15 (of Edom), "But the pelican [ḳā'āth] and the porcupine [ḳippōdh] shall possess it; and the owl [yanshōph] and the raven ['ōrēbh] shall dwell therein: . . . . and it shall be a habitation of jackals [tannīm], a court for ostriches [benōth ya'ănāh]. And the wild beasts of the desert [çīyīm] shall meet with the wolves ['īyīm], and the wild goat [sā'īr] shall cry to his fellow; yea, the night monster [līlīth] shall settle there. . . . . There shall the dart-snake [ḳippōz] make her nest . . . . there shall the kites [dayyōth] be gathered, every one with her mate."

The question is whether sāʿīr and seʿīrīm in these passages stand for real or for fabulous animals. In Lev 17 7 and 2 Ch 11 15, it is clear that they are objects of worship, but that still leaves open the question of their nature, though it may to many minds make "devils" or "demons" or "satyrs" seem preferable to "he-goats." In Isa 13 20 we read, "neither shall the Arabian pitch tent there; neither shall shepherds make their flocks to lie down there." This may very likely have influenced the American Committee of Revisers to use "wild goat" in Isa 13 21 and 34 14 instead of the "he-goat" of the other passages. In ARV, no fabulous creatures (except perhaps "night-monster") are mentioned here, but LXX employs daimonia, "demons," in Isa 13 21 for seʿīrīm and in 34 14 for çīyīm; ὀνοκένταυροι, onokéntauroi, from ὄνος, ónos, "ass," and κένταυρος, kéntauros, "centaur," in Isa 13 22 and 34 14 for 'īyīm, and again in 34 14 for līlīth; σειρῆνες, seirḗnes, "sirens," in Isa 13 21 for benōth yaʿănāh, and in 34 13 for tannīm. We must bear in mind the uncertainty regarding the identity of çīyīm, 'īyīm, 'ōḥīm and tannīm, as well as of some of the other names, and we must recall the tales that are hung about the name līlīth (AV "screech owl," AVm and RV "night-monster," RVm "Lilith"). While sāʿīr is almost alone among these words in having ordinarily a well-understood meaning, i.e. "he-goat," there is good reason for considering that here it is used in an exceptional sense. The tr "satyr" has certainly much to be said for it. See GOAT; JACKAL.

I. Early History.—The name Saul is usually regarded as simply the passive participle of the vb. "to ask," and so meaning "asked" (cf 1 S 8 4 ff), but the gentilic adj. shā'ūlī (Nu 26 13) would point to its having also an intensive connotation, "the one asked importunately," or perhaps, "the one asking insistently," "the beggar."

1. Name and Meaning

2. Genealogy

Saul was the son of Kish, a Benjamite. His genealogical tree is given in 1 S 9 1 (cf LXX 10 21). In 1 S 9 1 his grandfather is Abiel, but in 1 Ch 8 33; 9 39, Ner, who appears as his paternal uncle in 1 S 14 50.51.

The last verse contains a very curious scribal error, a yodh having slipped out of one word in it into another. It states that both Abner and Ner were sons of Abiel. These apparent inconsistencies are to be explained by the fact that in Heb, as in Arab., "son" is often used in the sense of grandson. Also, with the facility of divorce then prevalent, by "brother" and "sister" we must in most cases understand half-brother and half-sister. Moreover, Saul's mother might have been the wife at different times of Kish and of his brother Ner (cf 1 S 20 30). This was quite common, and in some cases compulsory (Dt 25 5–9).

3. Home and Station

Saul's home was at GIBEAH (q.v.), which is also called Gibeah of Saul, i.e. Saul's Hill (1 S 11 4; cf also 10 5, God's Hill, or simply The Hill, 10 10; Hos 5 8, etc), or the Hill of Benjamin or of the Benjamites (1 S 13 15; 2 S 23 29). It is usually identified with Tell el-Fûl. This conspicuous small tell, 3 miles north of Jerusalem, was excavated in 1922 by Dr. W. F. Albright. The simplicity of things was in harmony with the humble early life of Saul and justifies the self-depreciation which he expressed upon being chosen to be king (1 S 9 21).

The very brief record of the history of the times found in 1 S and 2 S is not easily understood. The historians of the time were analysts who set down various episodes briefly and independently.

4. Sources for Life

The attempt to understand these as a continuous narrative after the fashion of modern histories is not successful, if, indeed, it be a reasonable attempt.

5. Election as King

Especially is this true of the account of the anointing of Saul as king. There is undoubtedly a double line of events rather than a duplication of narratives: God was directing Samuel (1 S 9 10–16); on the other hand foreign oppression made the elders of the people feel the need of a more centralized government (1 S 8; 10 17–27; 12). In addition there had been the practice of Samuel as Judge. There were, during the whole history of the Judges, three provinces of judgships, a north district, an east district, and a southwest district. And the historian in the Book of Judges goes around these in regular succession four times. Then Samuel judged in each of the three districts in circuit "to Bethel and Gilgal and Mizpah and judged Israel in all those places," and also at Ramah his home town in the center. He was centralizing the government (1 S 7 15–17).

6. Reasons for it

This practice of Samuel undoubtedly was a molding influence on the desire of the people for a king. Then three reasons additional appear in the narrative for placing a king at the head of the government of the nation; the unworthy character of Samuel's sons and his apparent desire to make the judgship hereditary (1 S 8 1 ff), the long standing and terrible oppression by the Philistines (1 S 9 16), and latterly an invasion by Ammonites (1 S 12 12).

1. His First Action

II. Reign and Fall.—The election of Saul at Mizpah was conducted in the presence of the chieftains of the clans; it is not to be supposed that the whole nation was present. As soon as it was over, the electors went home, and Saul also returned to his father's farm and, like Cincinnatus, once more followed the plough. "Within about a month," however (10 27 LXX, for MT "But he held his peace"), the summons came. A message from the citizens of JABESH-GILEAD (q.v.) was sent round the tribes appealing for help against the Ammonites under Nahash. They, of course, knew nothing about what had taken place at Mizpah, and it was only by chance that their messengers arrived at Gibeah when they did. Saul rose to the occasion, and immediately after he was acclaimed king by the whole body of the people (ch 11). This double election, first by the chiefs and then by the people, is quite a regular proceeding.

2. Army Reorganized

This first success encouraged Saul to enter upon what was to be the mission of his life, namely, the throwing off of the Phili suzerainty. From the first he had had the boldest spirits upon his side (10 26 LXX, RVm); he was now able to form a standing army of 3,000 men, under the command of himself and his son JONATHAN (q.v.). The Philis, the last remnant of the Minoan race, had the advantage of the possession of iron weapons. It was, in fact, they who introduced iron into Pal from Crete—the Israelites knowing only bronze, and having even been deprived of weapons of the softer metals. They seem to have armed themselves—with the exception of the king and his son—with mattocks and ploughshares (13 19 ff).

The first encounter was the attack upon the Phili post at Michmash (1 S 13, 14). The text of the narrative is uncertain, but the following outline is clear. On hearing that the Hebrews had revolted (13 3 LXX), the Philis gathered in great force, including 3,000 chariots (13 5 LXX; MT has 30,000) at Michmash. In dismay, Saul's troops deserted (vs 6 f), until he was left with only 600 (14 2).

3. Battle of Michmash

In spite of this, Jonathan precipitated hostilities by a reckless attack upon one of the outposts. This was so successful that the whole Phili army was seized with panic, and the onset of Saul and the desertion of their Heb slaves completed their discomfiture. Saul followed up his victory by making predatory excursions on every side (14 47).

4. Defeats the Amalekites

Saul's next expedition was against the Amalekites under Agag, who were likewise completely defeated. The fight was carried out with all the remorselessness common to tribal warfare. Warning was sent to the friendly Kenites to withdraw out of danger; then the hostile tribe was slaughtered to a man, their chief alone being spared for the time being. Even the women and children were not taken as slaves, but were all killed (1 S 15).

5. Deposition Pronounced

It is not clear what was the precise attitude of Samuel toward Saul. As the undoubted head of the theocracy he naturally objected to his powers being curtailed by the loss of the civil power (8 6). Even after the elections of Saul, Samuel claimed to be the ecclesiastical head of the state. He seems to have objected to Saul's offering the sacrifice before battle (13 10 ff), and to have considered him merely as his lieutenant (15 3) who could be dismissed for disobedience (15 14 ff). Here again some think to see two accounts woven together, because Saul in one place is presented as weary waiting (1 S 13 8) and in the other is guilty of disobedience (1 S 15 3 ff). There is no contradiction, or inconsistency, or even discrepancy here; in the one instance, Saul is trying to excuse himself; in the other his wrongdoing is denounced.

6. David introduced to Saul

For a time, how long is not certainly known, Samuel mourned for Saul and allowed him to go on unhindered in the exercise of his kingly office. The time has been estimated at about fifteen years; it seems doubtful, if it could have been so long. Then we read (1 S 16 1), "And the Lord said unto Samuel, 'How long wilt thou mourn over Saul seeing I have rejected him from reigning over Israel? fill thine horn with oil, and go, I will send thee to Jesse, the Bethlehemite: for I have provided me a king among his sons.'" Samuel feared to go on this errand, for Saul would undoubtedly regard his act as treasonable. So God sent the prophet secretly to annoint David (1 S 16 2–5). Saul did not at once accept his deposition, but he lost heart. And then his servants introduced to him a musician who played until his spirits revived (16 14 ff; cf 2 K 3 15).

7. Two Accounts

In the providence of God (cf I, 5), this same minstrel was the very person whom Samuel had secretly anointed to supplant Saul. According to what looks like another account, however, it was his encounter with Goliath which led to the introduction of David to Saul (17 1 ff; see DAVID). In spite of all that has been said to the contrary, the two narratives are not incompatible, since we are not told the order of the events nor over how many years these events were spread. The theory of duplicate narratives rests upon the assumption that all statements made by the dramatis personae in the Bible are to be taken at their face value. If chs 16 and 17 had formed part of a play of Shakespeare, they would have been considered a fine example of his genius. Treatises would have been written to explain why Saul did not recognize David, and why Abner denied all knowledge of him. LXX, however, omits 17 12–31.41.50.55—18 5.

8. Saul's Envy of David

Whether Saul actually discovered that David had been anointed by Samuel or not, he soon saw in him his rival and inevitable successor, and he would hardly have been human if he had not felt envious of him. His dislike of David had two motives. The first was jealousy, because the women preferred the military genius of David to his own (18 7 f). His consequent attempt upon the life of David (vs 8–11) is omitted in LXX. Not least was the love of his own daughter for David (18 20; in ver 28 read with LXX "all Israel"). The second cause was his natural objection to see his son Jonathan supplanted in his rights to the throne, an objection which was aggravated by the devotion of that son to his own rival (20 30; see also David; Jonathan).

9. Attempts to Get Rid of Him

Saul could not believe that David could remain loyal to him (24 9); at the first favorable opportunity he would turn upon him, hurl him from the throne, and exterminate his whole house. In these circumstances, it was his first interest to get rid of him. His first attempt to do so (omitting with LXX 18 8*b*–11) was to encourage him to make raids on the Philis in the hope that these might kill him (18 21 ff); his next, assassination by one of his servants (19 1), and then by his own hand (19 9 f). When David was compelled to fly, the quarrel turned to civil war. The superstitious fear of hurting the chosen of Jeh had given place to blind rage. Those who sheltered the fugitive, even priests, were slaughtered (22 17 ff). From one spot to another David was hunted, as he says, like a partridge (26 20).

10. David Spares Saul

It is generally maintained that here also we have duplicate accounts; for example, that there are two accounts of David taking refuge with Achish, king of Gath, and two of his sparing Saul's life. The latter are contained in chs 24 and 26, but the points of resemblance are slight. Three thousand (24 2; 26 2) was the number of Saul's picked men (cf 13 2). David uses the simile of "a flea" in 24 14, but in 26 20 for "a flea" LXX has "my soul," which is no doubt original. The few other expressions would occur naturally in any narrative with the same contents.

11. Saul's Divided Energies

Obviously Saul's divided energies could not hold out long; he could not put down the imaginary rebellion within, and at the same time keep at bay the foreign foe. No sooner had he got the fugitive within his grasp than he was called away by an inroad of the Philis (23 27 f); but after his life had been twice spared, he seemed to realize at last that the latter were the real enemy, and he threw his whole strength into one desperate effort for existence.

12. Consults a Necromancer

Saul himself saw that his case was desperate, and that in fact the game was up. As a forlorn hope he determined to seek occult advice. He could no longer use the official means of divination (28 6), and was obliged to have recourse to a necromancer, one of a class whom he himself had taken means to suppress (28 3). The result of the séance confirmed his worst fears and filled his soul with despair (28 7 ff).

13. Battle of Gilboa

It says much for Saul that, hopeless as he was, he engaged in one last forlorn struggle with the enemy. The Philis had gathered in great force at Shunem. Saul drew up his army on the opposing hill of Gilboa. Between the two forces lay a valley (cf 14 4). The result was what had been foreseen. The Israelites, no doubt greatly reduced in numbers (contrast 11 8), were completely defeated, and Saul and his sons slain. Their armor was placed in the temple of Ashtaroth, and their bodies hung on the wall of Bethshan, but Saul's head was set in the temple of Dagon (1 Ch 10 10). The citizens of Jabesh-gilead, out of ancient gratitude, rescued the bodies and, in un-Semitic wise, burned them and buried the bones.

It is one of the marvels of recent excavation that at Beisan, the ancient Beth-shean (1922–28) upon reaching the layer of débris indicated by the pottery to be of the time of the early monarchy of Israel, the temple of Ashtaroth was laid bare; possession of Beth-shean by the Philistines is clearly shown and also that the Philistines were but tools of the Egyptians. Thus Beth-shean remained in Egyptian control until the rise of the dynasty of David.

14. Double accounts

Here again attempts have been made to find two accounts, setting 1 S 31 4 over against 2 S 1 2 ff. Really there is no discrepancy, and we have no means of knowing whether the Amalekite who was seeking a reward, was telling the truth or not.

15. Saul's Posterity

With Saul the first Israelite dynasty began and ended. The names of his sons are given in 1 S 14 49 as Jonathan, Ishvi and Malchishua. Ishvi or Ishyo (LXX) is Eshbaal, called in 2 S 2 8 Ish-bosheth (q.v.). 1 Ch 8 33 adds Abinadab. Jonathan left a long line of descendants famous, like himself, as archers (1 Ch 8 34 ff). The rest of Saul's posterity apparently died out. Malchishua and Abinadab were slain at Gilboa (1 S 31 6; 1 Ch 10 2), and Ish-bosheth was assassinated shortly after (2 S 4 2 ff). Saul had also two natural sons by Rizpah who were put to death by David in accordance with a superstitious custom, as also were the five sons of Saul's daughter Merab (2 S 21 8, not Michal; cf 1 S 18 19). Saul's other daughter Michal apparently had no children. Saul had, it seems, other wives, who were taken into the harem of David in accordance with the practice of the times (2 S 12 8), but of them and their descendants we know nothing.

III. Character.—Saul's life and character are disposed of in a somewhat summary fashion by the Chronicler (1 Ch 10, esp. vs. 13.14). "So Saul died for his transgression which he committed against the Lord, even against the word of the Lord which he kept not, and also for asking council of one that had a familiar spirit, to inquire of it; and inquired not of the Lord."

1. Book of Chronicles

2. Saul's Failings

Like everyone else, Saul had his virtues and his failings. His chief weakness seems to have been want of decision of character. He was easily swayed by events and by people. The praises of David (1 S 18 7 f) at once set his jealousy on fire. His persecution of David was largely due to the instigation of mischievous courtiers (24 9). Upon remonstrance his repentance was as deep as it was short-lived (24 16; 26 21). His impulsiveness was such that he did not know where to stop. His interdict (14 24 ff) was quite as uncalled for as his religious zeal (15 9) was out of place. He was always at one extreme. His hatred of David was only equal to his affection for him at first (18 2). His pusillanimity led him to commit crimes which his own judgment would have forbidden (22 17). Like most beaten persons, he became suspicious of everyone (22 7 f), and, like those who are easily led, he soon found his evil genius (22 9.18.22). Saul's inability to act alone appears from the fact that he never engaged in single combat, so far as we know. Before he could act at all his fury or his pity had to be roused to boiling-point (11 6). His mind was peculiarly subject to external influences, so that he was now a respectable man of the world, now a prophet (10 11; 19 24).

3. His Virtues

On the other hand, Saul possessed many high qualities. His dread of office (10 22) was only equaled by the coolness with which he accepted it (11 5). To the first call to action he responded with promptitude (11 6 ff). His timely aid excited the lasting gratitude of the citizens of Jabesh-gilead (31 11 ff). If we remember that Saul was openly disowned by Samuel (15 30), and believed himself cast off by Jeh, we cannot but admire the way in which he fought on to the last. Moreover, the fact that he retained not only his own sons, but a sufficient body of fighting men to engage a large army of Philis, shows that there must have been something in him to excite confidence and loyalty.

4. David's Elegy

There is, however, no question as to the honorable and noble qualities of Saul. The chief were his prowess in war and his generosity in peace. They have been set down by the man who knew him best in what are among the most authentic verses in the Bible (2 S 1 19 ff).

SAVARAN, sav'a-ran: AV=RV AVARAN (q.v.).

SAVE, sāv: In the sense "except," the word came into Eng. through the Fr. (sauf) and is fairly common (38 t, in addition to "saving," AV Eccl 5 11; Am 9 8; Mt 5 32; Lk 4 27; Rev 2 17). It represents no particular Heb or Gr terms but is employed wherever it seems useful. It is still in good (slightly archaic) use, and RV has few modifications (Dt 15 4 AV; Ps 18 31*b*, etc), but ERV has dropped "saving" in Lk 4 27 and Rev 2 17 and ARV also in Eccl 5 11; Am 9 8, retaining it only in Mt 5 32.

SAVIAS, sa-vī'as (Σαουΐα, Saouía): In 1 Esd 8 2, for Uzzi, an ancestor of Ezra, in Ezr 7 4.

SAVIOUR, sāv'yēr: (1) While that "God is the deliverer of his people" is the concept on which, virtually, the whole OT is based (see SALVATION), yet the Hebrews seem never to have felt the need of a title for God that would sum up this aspect of His relation to man. Nearest to our word "Saviour" is a participial form (מוֹשִׁיעַ, mōshīaʿ) from the vb. יָשַׁע, yāshāʿ (Qal not used; "save" in Hiphil), but even this participle is not frequently applied to God (some 13 t of which 7 are in Isa 43–63). (2) In the NT, however, the case is different, and Σωτήρ, Sōtḗr, is used in as technical a way as is our "Saviour." But the distribution of the 24 occurrences of the word is significant, for two-thirds of them are found in the later books of the NT—10 in the Pastorals, 5 in 2 Pet, and one each in Jn, 1 Jn, and Jude—while the other instances are Lk 1 47; 2 11; Acts 5 31; 13 23; Eph 5 23; Phil 3 20. And there are no occurrences in Mt, Mk, or the earlier Pauline Epp. The data are clear enough. As might be expected, the fact that the OT used no technical word for Saviour meant that neither did the earliest Christianity use any such word. Doubtless for Our Lord "Messiah" was felt to convey the meaning. But in Gr-speaking Christianity, "Christ," the tr of Messiah, soon became treated as a proper name, and a new word was needed. (3) Sōtēr expressed the exact meaning and had already been set apart in the language of the day as a religious term, having become one of the most popular Divine titles in use. Indeed, it was felt to be a most inappropriate word to apply to a human being. Cicero, for instance, arraigns Verres for using it: "Soter . . . . How much does this imply? So much that it cannot be expressed in one word in Latin" (Verr. ii.2, 63, § 154). So the adoption of Sōtēr by Christianity was most natural, the word seemed ready-made. (4) That the NT writers derived the word from its contemporary use is shown, besides, by its occurrence in combination with such terms as "manifestation" (epipháneia, 2 Tim 1 10; Tit 2 13), "love toward man" (philanthrōpía, Tit 3 4), "captain" (archēgós, Acts 5 31; cf He 2 10), etc. These terms are found in the Gr sources many times in exactly the same combinations with Sōtēr. (5) In the NT Sōtēr is uniformly reserved for Christ, except in Lk 1 47; Jude ver 25, and the Pastorals. In 1 Tim (1 1; 2 3; 4 10) it is applied only to the Father, in 2 Tim (1 10, only) it is applied to Christ, while in Tit there seems to be a deliberate alternation: of the Father in 1 3; 2 10; 3 4; of Christ in 1 4; 2 13; 3 6.

SAVOR, sā'vẽr (רֵיחַ, rēaḥ; ὀσμή, osmḗ): (1) The primary meaning of the word is "taste," "flavor" (from Lat sapor, "taste"). So in Mt 5 13; Lk 14 34, "if the salt have lost its savor" (μωρανθῇ, mōranthḗ, "become tasteless," "insipid," so as to lose its characteristic preserving virtue). (2) But generally it has the meaning of "smell," "odor": (a) once of evil odor: "Its stench shall come up, and its ill savor shall come up" (Joel 2 20); (b) elsewhere in the sense of pleasant smell. In the OT, with the exception of Ex 5 21 and AV Cant 1 3 (RV "fragrance"), it is always accompanied by the adj. "sweet." It stands for the smell of sacrifices and oblations, in agreement with the ancient anthropomorphic idea that God smells and is pleased with the fragrance of sacrifices (e.g. "Jeh smelled the sweet savor," Gen 8 21; "to make a sweet savor unto Jeh," Nu 15 3; and frequently). In the NT, "savor" in the sense of smell is used metaphorically: (a) once the metaphor is borrowed from the incense which attends the victor's triumphal procession; God is said to make manifest through His apostles "the savor of his knowledge in every place" as He "leadeth" them "in triumph in Christ" (2 Cor 2 14; see TRIUMPH). (b) Elsewhere the metaphor is borrowed from the fragrant smell of the sacrifices. The apostles "are a sweet savor of Christ unto God" (2 Cor 2 15), i.e. they are, as it were, a sweet odor for God to smell, an odor which is pleasing to God, even though its effect upon men varies (to some it is a "savor from death unto death," i.e. such as is emitted by death and itself causes death; to others it is "a savor from life unto life," ver 16). By the same sacrificial metaphor, Christ's offering of Himself to God is said to be "for a sweet smelling savor" (Eph 5 2 AV, RV "for an odor of a sweet smell"; the same phrase is used in Phil 4 18 of acts of kindness to Paul, which were "a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God"). (3) Once it is used in the figurative sense of reputation: "Ye have made our savor to be abhorred [lit. "our smell to stink"] in the eyes of Pharaoh" (Ex 5 21). Cf the Eng. phrase, "to be in bad odor."

The vb. "to savor" means: (1) intransitively, to taste or smell of, to partake of the quality of something, as in the Preface of AV, "to savour more of curiosity than wisdome," or (2) transitively, to perceive by the taste or smell, to discern: "thou savourest not the things that be of God" (AV Mt 16 23; Mk 8 33, RV "mindest"; φρονεῖς, phroneís; Vulg sapis). The adj. "savory" occurs only in Gen 27 4.7.9.14.17.31 ("savory food") and RV Isa 30 24 (m "salted").

SAYEST, sā′est: "Thou sayest" (Mt 27 11; Mk 15 2; Lk 22 70, "Ye say"; Jn 18 37), i.e. rightly; "Thou hast said" (Mt 26 25.64), = "Yes"; a rabbinical idiom never found in the OT. Mark (14 62) renders by "I am." All these passages WHm punctuate interrogatively (cf Kethūbhōth, f. 103 b).

SCAB, skab, SCABBED, skab′ed, skabd (יַלֶּפֶת, yallepheth, מִסְפַּחַת, mişpaḥath, סַפַּחַת, şappaḥath, vb. שִׂפַּח, sippaḥ; σημασία, sēmasía, λειχήν, leichḗn): These are generic terms for any skin disease in which there are patches of hard crusts on the surface. The commonest of these are the forms now named eczema, herpes and, perhaps, psoriasis, all of which are common in Bible lands. Milder cases in which the disease was localized and in small patches (the sēmasia of LXX) did not render the bearer unclean, and they were to be distinguished by the priest (Lev 13 2.6) from the more virulent and spreading eruptions which (ver 7) were regarded as causes of ceremonial uncleanness. These severer forms are the leichēn of LXX mentioned in Lev 21 20, which disqualified any son of Aaron from serving as a priest, and when affecting an animal rendered it unfit to be offered as a burnt offering (Lev 22 22). Hippocrates speaks of these cases as obstinate and persistent, and Galen believed that they might degenerate into leprosy; hence the terms in which Aeschylus speaks of it (Choephori 281). Celsus, however, recognized that leichēn was a papular eruption, not a true scab. The name yallepheth seems to have been given to it on account of the firmness of attachment of the scabs, while the term mişpaḥath refers to its tendency to spread and cover the surface. A cognate word in Ezk 13 18 is the name of a large ṭallith or prayer veil used by the false prophetesses in Israel (trd "kerchief"). Scabs were esp. disfiguring on the head, and this infliction was threatened as a punishment on the daughters of Zion for their wanton haughtiness (Isa 3 17). In Middle Eng., "scab" is used for itch or mange, and as a term of opprobrium, as in Greene, Bacon and Bungay, 35, 1591.

SCABBARD, skab′ard, SHEATH, shēth. See Armor, III, 5; War, 9.

SCAFFOLD, skaf′old (כִּיּוֹר, kiyyōr): The Eng. word is used once of Solomon's "brazen scaffold" on which he knelt at the dedication of the temple (2 Ch 6 13).

SCALE, skāl. See Siege, 4, (e); Weights and Measures.

SCALES, skālz ([1] קַשְׂקֶשֶׂת, ḳasḳeseth, "fish-scales"; [2] מְגִנָּה, meghinnāh, מָגֵן, māghēn, "scales of the crocodile"; [3] λεπίς, lepís, with vb. λεπίζω, lepízō, "scale away" [Tob 3 17; 11 13]): (1) The first Heb word ḳasḳeseth means the imbricated scales of fish, which together with the dorsal fin were a distinguishing mark of all fish allowed as food to the Israelite (Lev 11 9 ff; Dt 14 9 f). In the figurative sense the word is used of a coat of mail (1 S 17 5.38). (2) Meghinnāh from māghēn, lit. "a buckler" or "small shield" (2 Ch 23 9; Jer 46 3), is used in the description of the crocodile (see Leviathan) for the horny scales or scutes imbedded in the skin, not imbricated upon it (Job 41 15 [Heb ver 7]). (3) The Gr lepis, which in classical language has a much wider range of meaning than the above Heb words ("rind," "husk," "shell," "fish-scale," "scale of snake," "flake of metal and of snow," etc), is found in the NT description of St. Paul's recovery from temporary blindness, "And straightway there fell from his eyes as it were scales, and he received his sight" (Acts 9 18). There is nothing in the words of the sacred text which compels us to think of literal scales. (In Tob, however, a literal flaking-off of foreign substance is meant.) We have here rather a description of the sensation which terminated the three days' period of blindness which the apostle suffered after his meeting with the risen Lord on the road to Damascus. The apostle himself does not use this expression in his own graphic description of the same experience: "In that very hour I looked upon him" (22 13). The phrase has, however, come into Eng., for we speak of "scales falling from one's eyes" when we mean a sudden illumination or remembrance or a dissipation of harassing doubt.

In Isa 40 12; RV Prov 16 11 for פֶּלֶס, peleş, in the sense of "instrument for weighing." See Balance.

H. L. E. Luering

SCALL, skôl (נֶתֶק, netheḳ; θραύσμα, thraúsma): This only occurs in Lev 13 and 14 where it is used 14 t to describe bald or scaly patches of eruption on the skin. Such patches are generally the result of the action of parasitic organisms. The common form known now as scalled head is produced by a microscopic plant, Achōrion schoenleinii. In Old and Middle Eng., scall was used for scabbiness of the head (Chaucer and Spenser). See also Skeat, Concise Etymol. Dict. of Eng. Language.

SCARLET, skär′let. See Colors; Dyeing.

SCARLET (WORM) (תּוֹלַעַת שָׁנִי, tōla'ath shānī [Ex 25 4, etc]): Cermes vermilio, a scale insect from which a red dye is obtained. See Color; Dyeing; Worm.

SCATTERED ABROAD, skat′ẽrd a-brôd′. See Dispersion.

SCENT, sent: (1) In Hos 14 7, "The scent [m "his memorial"] thereof shall be as the wine of Lebanon." "Scent" is used for זֵכֶר, zekher (so MT, but the pointing is uncertain), properly "memorial," whence RVm. The Eng. tr comes through the LXX which took zkr as "offering of sweet savor," and so "sweet savor." For the "wine of Lebanon" see Wine. If this tr is not right, the alternative is "memorial" in the sense of "renown." (2) Job 14 9; Jer 48 11 for רֵיחַ, *rē*a*ḥ,* "odor." "Scent" of the water in Job 14 9 is poetic for "contact with." (3) Wisd 11 18 AV has "filthy scents of scattered smoke," where "scent" is used in the obsolete sense of "disagreeable odor." The tr is, however, very loose, and "scents" is a gloss; RV "noisome smoke."

SCEPTRE, SCEPTER, sep′tẽr (שֵׁבֶט, shēbhet, שַׁרְבִיט, sharbhīṭ, expanded form in Est 4 11; 5 2; 8 4; ῥάβδος, rhábdos [Ad Est 15 11; He 1 8], σκῆπτρος, skḗptros): A rod or mace used by a sovereign as a symbol of royal authority. The Heb shēbheṭ is the ordinary word for rod or club, and is used of an ordinary rod (cf 2 S 7 14), of the shepherd's crook (Ps 23 4), scribe's baton or marshal's staff (Jgs 5 14), as well as of the symbol of royalty. Its symbolism may be connected with the use of the shēbheṭ for protection (2 S 23 21; Ps 23 4) or for punishment (Isa 10 24; 30 31). It is used with reference to the royal line descended from Judah (Gen 49 10), and figuratively of sovereignty in general and possibly of conquest (Nu 24 17, in Israel; Isa 14 5, in Babylonia; Am 1 5.8, in Syria, among Philis; Zec 10 11, in Egypt), the disappearance or cutting off of him that holdeth the scepter being tantamount to loss of national independence. The kingship of Jeh is spoken of as a scepter (Ps 45 6 [Heb ver 7] quoted in He 1 8). The manner of using the scepter by an oriental monarch is suggested in the act of Ahasuerus, who holds it out to Esther as a mark of favor. The subject touches the top of it, perhaps simply as an act of homage or possibly to indicate a desire to be heard. The scepter of Ahasuerus is spoken of as "golden" (Est 5 2), but it is probable that scepters were ordinarily made of straight branches (maṭeh) of certain kinds of vines (Ezk 19 11.14).

It is sometimes difficult to determine whether the word shēbheṭ is used in figurative passages in the sense of scepter or merely in the ordinary sense of staff (e.g. Ps 125 3, AV "rod," RV and ARV "sceptre" [of the wicked]; Ps 2 9, "rod of iron"; Prov 22 8, "rod of his wrath"). Another word, m^{e}ḥōḳēḳ, lit. "prescribing" (person or thing), formerly tr^{d} uniformly "lawgiver," is now generally taken, on the basis of parallelism, to mean "sceptre" in four poetic passages (Gen 49 10, "ruler's staff" to avoid repetition; Nu 21 18; Ps 60 7; 108 8).

NATHAN ISAACS

SCEVA, sē′va (Σκευᾶ, Skeuá): A Jew, a chief priest, resident in Ephesus, whose seven sons were exorcists (Acts 19 14 ff). Ewald regards the name as being Heb sh^{e}khabhyāh. He was not an officiating priest, as there were only synagogues in Asia Minor. He may have belonged to a high-priestly family, or perhaps at one time he had been at the head of one of the 24 courses in the temple.

In the narrative the construction is loose. There were seven sons (ver 14), and it would appear (ver 16) that in this particular case all were present. But (ver 16) the demon-possessed man overpowered "both of them." TR gets over the difficulty by omitting "both," but אABD, so Tisch., WH, Soden, and best critics, retain the difficult reading. The explanation is that ver 14 states the custom: "who did this" being hoi toúto poioúntes, "who used to do this." Vs 15 and 16 state a particular case in which two took part, but the incident is introduced in a careless manner.

Ewald would translate amphotérōn as "in both sides," but this is impossible. Baur understood "disciples" for "sons." D and Syr have an interesting expansion which Blass considers original (ver 14): "Among whom also the sons [Syr 'seven'] of a certain Sceva, a priest, wished to do the same, [who] were in the custom of exorcising such. And entering into the demon-possessed man they began to call upon the Name, saying, 'We charge you by Jesus whom Paul preaches to come out.' "

S. F. HUNTER

SCHISM, siz′m (σχίσμα, schísma): Only in 1 Cor 12 25. The same Gr word, lit. "a split," is tr^{d} "rent" in Mt 9 16; Mk 2 21; and "division" in Jn 7 43; 9 16; 10 19. It designates "a separation," not from, but within, the church, interfering with the harmonious coördination and coöperation of the members described in the preceding verses (1 Cor 12 18 ff). The ecclesiastical meaning is that of a break from a church organization, that may or may not be connected with a doctrinal dissent.

SCHOOL, skōōl (σχολή, scholḗ). See TYRANNUS.

SCHOOLMASTER, skōōl′mas-tēr: Gal 3 24 f AV reads: "The law was our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ, that we might be justified by faith. But after that faith is come, we are no longer under a schoolmaster." "Schoolmaster" is a tr of παιδαγωγός, paidagōgós, lit. "child-leader." This paidagōgos was not a teacher but a slave, to whom in wealthy families the general oversight of a boy was committed. It was his duty to accompany his charge to and from school, never to lose sight of him in public, to prevent association with objectionable companions, to inculcate moral lessons at every opportunity, etc. He was a familiar figure in the streets, and the (sour) "face of a paidagōgos" and "to follow one like a paidagōgos" were proverbial expressions. Naturally, to the average boy the paidagōgos must have represented the incorporation of everything objectionable. Hence St. Paul's figure may be paraphrased: "The law was a paidagōgos, necessary but irksome, to direct us until the time of Christ. Then was the time of our spiritual coming-of-age, so that the control of the paidagōgos ceased." The word paidagōgos was taken over into Aram. at an early date, and St. Paul's language, which is hardly that of a mere adult observer, suggests that he had had personal experience with the institution. Wealthy and intensely orthodox Jewish parents living in a gentile city may well have adopted such a precaution for the protection of their children.

No Eng. word renders paidagōgos adequately. "Schoolmaster" is quite wrong, but RV's "tutor" (cf 1 Cor 4 15) is little better in modern Eng.

SCHOOLS OF THE PROPHETS. See EDUCATION; PROPHETS.

SCIENCE, sī′ens: This word as found in AV means simply "knowledge." "Science" occurs in AV only in two places, Dnl 1 4, "children . . . . understanding science" (יֹדְעֵי דַעַת, yōdh^{e}ʽē dhaʽath, "those who understand science"). The meaning of the term here is "knowledge," "wisdom." The only other occurrence of "science" is in the NT (1 Tim 6 20, "avoiding . . . . oppositions of science falsely so called," τῆς ψευδωνύμου γνώσεως, tḗs pseudōnúmou gnṓseōs, "the falsely called gnōsis"). "Science" is the tr of the Gr gnōsis, which in the NT is usually rendered "knowledge." The science here referred to was a higher knowledge of Christian and Divine things, which false teachers alleged that they possessed, and of which they boasted. It was an incipient form of Gnosticism, and it prevailed to a considerable extent in the churches of proconsular Asia, e.g. in Colossae and Ephesus. Timothy is put on his guard against the teaching of this gnōsis falsely so called, for it set itself in opposition to the gospel. See GNOSTICISM.

"Science" in the modern sense of the word, as the discovery and orderly classification and exposition of the phenomena and of the laws of Nature, is not found either in the OT or the NT unless the passage in Dnl be interpreted as meaning the scientific knowledge which the learned men of Babylon possessed of mathematics and astronomy, etc. See also Acts 7 22. To the Heb mind all natural phenomena meant the working of the hand of God in the world, directly and immediately, without the intervention of any secondary laws.

JOHN RUTHERFURD

SCIMITAR, sim′i-tar, -tẽr (ἀκινάκη, akinákē): Formerly given as "fauchion" in AV Jth 13 6; 16 9, the weapon which Judith took down from the rail of the bed at Holofernes' head, and with which she severed his head from his body.

SCOFF, skof, SCOFFER, skof′ẽr: The vb. indicates the manifestation of contempt by insulting words or actions; it combines bitterness with ridicule. It is much more frequent in RV than in AV, replacing "scorn" of the latter in Ps 1 1; Prov 1 22, etc. "Scorn" refers rather to an inner emotion based on a sense of superiority; "scoff," to the outward expression of this emotion.

SCORN, skôrn: Fox Talbot connects this Eng. word with the Danish skarn, "dirt," "ordure," "mud," "mire." As distinguished from such words as "mock," "deride," "scoff," all of which refer specifically to the various ways in which scorn finds outward expression, scorn itself denotes a subjective state or reaction.

Further, this state or reaction is not simple but complex. It includes a sense of superiority, resentment, and aversion. This reaction occurs when one is confronted with a person or a proposition that by challenging certain things for itself evokes a vivid sense of one's own superiority and awakens mingled resentment, repulsion and contempt by the hollowness of its claims and its intrinsic inferiority or worse. Scorn is a hotter, fiercer emotion than disdain or contempt. It is obvious that scorn may—indeed, it not uncommonly does—arise in connection with an ungrounded, arrogant sense of self-esteem.

The word, outside of the phrase "laugh to scorn," is found only in the OT, and then only 4 t (Est 3 6; AV Ps 44 13; 79 4; Hab 1 10), and it represents three different Heb words for none of which it is a suitable rendering. The two words "thought scorn" in Est 3 6 represent but one in Heb, viz. bāzāh, for which "disdain" would be a nearer equivalent. In Hab 1 10 AV the word tr^d "scorn" is miṣḥāḳ, "an object of laughter," "laughing-stock." In Ps 44 13; 79 4 the Heb word is la'agh from a root, probably meaning "to stutter," "stammer," for which "mocking" is a better Eng. equivalent. In AV Job 34 7; Ps 123 4, la'agh is rendered "scorning" (the rendering given in Prov 1 22 to lāçōn, a word from a totally different root and one much more nearly approximating the fundamental idea of the Eng. word "scorn." In Prov 29 8 and Isa 28 14 lāçōn is rendered "scornful").

As a vb. the word is the tr given to lā'agh, "to mock" (2 K 19 21 ‖ Isa 37 22; Job 22 19; Neh 2 19; Ps 22 7, "all laugh to scorn"); ḳālas = "to scoff" (Ezk 16 31, m "Gr scoffeth," but text still "scorneth"); for the noun ç^{e}ḥōḳ, "laughter" (Ezk 23 32); sāḥaḳ = "to laugh," "laugh at" (Job 39 7.18; 2 Ch 30 10), with the noun s^{e}ḥōḳ, "laugh to scorn" (RV "laughing-stock," Job 12 4); lūç = "to scoff" (as used in ethical and religious connections) (Job 16 20; Prov 3 34; 9 12, all "scoff" in RV); in Prov 19 28 RV, not happily, "mock at." RV is warranted in substituting "scoff" for "scorn" because the context indicates some form of outward expression of the scorn.

RV always (except Job 12 4; Sir 6 4; 1 Macc 10 70) retains "laugh to scorn" (2 K 19 21; 2 Ch 30 10; Neh 2 19; Job 22 19; Ps 22 7; Isa 37 22; Ezk 16 31; 23 32; 2 Esd 2 21; Jth 12 12; Wisd 4 18; Sir 7 11; 13 7; 20 17; Mt 9 24; Mk 5 40; Lk 8 53). The vb. in Apoc and the NT is usually καταγελάω, katageláō, but in Wisd 4 1 ἐκγελάω, ekgeláō; in Sir 13 7 καταμωκάομαι, katamōkáomai; and in 2 Esd 2 21 inrideo. In addition "scorn" is retained in Est 3 6; Job 39 7.18; 2 Esd 8 56 (contemno). In Prov 19 28 "scorn" is changed to "mock at," but elsewhere invariably to "scoff."

Scorner is the tr of the participle of lūç, and once of the participle of lāçaç. For "scorner" RV everywhere substitutes—properly—"scoffer." Outside of Prov (and Hos 7 5) the word is to be found only in Ps 1 2. The force of the word has been well indicated by Cheyne, who says that the "scorner [scoffer] is one who despises that which is holy and avoids the company of the noble 'wise men,' but yet in his own vain way seeks for truth; his character is marked by arrogance as that of the wise is characterized by devout caution."

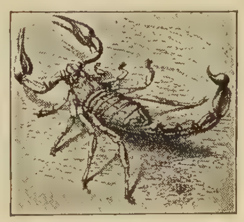
SCORPION, skôr′pi-un (עַקְרָב, 'aḳrābh; cf Arab. عَقْرَب, 'aḳrab, "scorpion"; מַעֲלֵה עַקְרַבִּים, ma'ălēh 'aḳrabbīm, "the ascent of Akrabbim"; σκορπίος, skorpíos. Note that the Gr and Heb may be akin; cf, omitting the vowels, 'krb and skrp): In Dt 8 15, we have, "who led thee through the great and terrible wilderness, wherein were fiery serpents [nāḥāsh sārāph] and scorpions ['aḳrābh]." Rehoboam (1 K 12 11.14; 2 Ch 10 11.14) says, "My father chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions." Ezekiel is told to prophesy to the children of Israel (2 6), and "Be not afraid of them, neither be afraid of their words, though briers and thorns are with thee, and thou dost dwell among scorpions." "The ascent of Akrabbim," the north end of Wâdi-ul-'Arabah, S. of the Dead Sea, is mentioned as a boundary 3 t (Nu 34 4; Josh 15 3; Jgs 1 36). Jesus says to the Seventy (Lk 10 19), "Behold, I have given you authority to tread upon serpents and scorpions," and again in Lk 11 12 He says, "Or if he shall ask an egg, will he give him a scorpion?"

Note that we have here three doublets, the loaf and the stone, the fish and the serpent, and the egg and the scorpion, whereas in the passage in Mt (7 9 f) we have only the loaf and stone and the fish and serpent. EB (s.v. "Scorpion") ingeniously seeks to bring Lk into nearer agreement with Mt by omitting from Lk the second doublet, i.e. the fish and the serpent, instancing several texts as authority for the omission, and reading ὄψον, ópson, "fish," for ᾠόν, ōón, "egg."

In Rev 9 2–10 there come out of the smoke of the abyss winged creatures ("locusts," ἀκρίδες, akrídes) like war-horses with crowns of gold, with the faces of men, hair of women, teeth of lions, breastplates of iron, and with stinging tails like scorpions. In Ecclus 26 7 it is said of an evil wife, "He that taketh hold of her is as one that graspeth a scorpion." In 1 Macc 6 51 we find mention of "pieces [σκορπίδια, skorpídia, diminutive of skorpios] to cast darts." In Plutarch skorpios is used in the same sense (Liddell and Scott, s.v. σκορπίος).

In the passage cited from Dt, and probably also in the name "ascent of Akrabbim," we find references to the abundance of scorpions, esp. in the warmer parts of the country. Though there is a Gr proverb, "Look for a scorpion under every stone," few would agree with the categorical statement of Tristram (NHB) that "every third stone is sure to conceal one." Nevertheless, campers and people sleeping on the ground need to exercise care in order to avoid their stings, which, though often exceedingly painful for several hours, are seldom fatal.



Scorpion.

Scorpions are not properly insects, but belong with spiders, mites and ticks to the Arachnidae. The scorpions of Pal are usually 2 or 3 in. long. The short cephalothorax bears a powerful pair of jaws, two long limbs terminating with pincers, which make the creature look like a small crayfish or lobster, and four pairs of legs. The rest of the body consists of the abdomen, a broad part continuous with the cephalothorax, and a slender part forming the long tail which terminates with the sting. The tail is usually carried curved over the back and is used for stinging the prey into insensibility. Scorpions feed mostly on insects for which they lie in wait. The scorpion family is remarkable for having existed with very little change from the Silurian age to the present time.

It does not seem necessary to consider that the words of Rehoboam (1 K 12 11, etc) refer to a whip that was called a scorpion, but rather that as the sting of a scorpion is worse than the lash of a whip, so his treatment would be harsher than his father's.

SCOURGE, skûrj, SCOURGING, skûr′jing (μάστιξ, mástix, μαστιγόω, mastigóō; in Acts 22 25 μαστίζω, mastízō, in Mk 15 15 ‖ Mt 27 26 φραγελλόω, phragellóō): A Rom implement for severe bodily punishment. Horace calls it horribile flagellum. It consisted of a handle, to which several cords or leather thongs were affixed, which were weighted with jagged pieces of bone or metal, to make the blow more painful and effective. It is comparable, in its horrid effects, only with the Russian knout. The victim was tied to a post (Acts 22 25) and the blows were applied to the back and loins, sometimes even, in the wanton cruelty of the executioner, to the face and the bowels. In the tense position of the body, the effect can easily be imagined. So hideous was the punishment that the victim usually fainted and not rarely died under it. Eusebius draws a horribly realistic picture of the torture of scourging (HE, IV, 15). By its application secrets and confessions were wrung from the victim (Acts 22 24). It usually preceded capital punishment (Livy xxxiii.36). It was illegal to apply the flagellum to a Rom citizen (Acts 22 25), since the Porcian and Sempronian laws, 248 and 123 BC, although these laws were not rarely broken in the provinces (Tac. Hist. iv.27; Cic. Verr. v.6, 62; Jos, BJ, II, xiv, 9). As among the Russians today, the number of blows was not usually fixed, the severity of the punishment depending entirely on the commanding officer. In the punishment of Jesus, we are reminded of the words of Ps 129 3. Among the Jews the punishment of flagellation was well known since the Egyp days, as the monuments abundantly testify. The word "scourge" is used in Lev 19 20, but ARV translates "punished," the original word biḳḳōreth expressing the idea of investigation. Dt 25 3 fixed the mode of a Jewish flogging and limits the number of blows to 40. Apparently the flogging was administered by a rod. The Syrians reintroduced true scourging into Jewish life, when Antiochus Epiphanes forced them by means of it to eat swine's flesh (2 Macc 6 30; 7 1). Later it was legalized by Jewish law and became customary (Mt 10 17; 23 34; Acts 22 19; 26 11), but the traditional limitation of the number of blows was still preserved. Says Paul in his "foolish boasting": "in stripes above measure," "of the Jews five times received I forty stripes save one," distinguishing it from the "beatings with rods," thrice repeated (2 Cor 11 23–25).

SCRABBLE, skrab′′l: Occurs only in 1 S 21 13, as the tr of תָּוָה, tāwāh: "David . . . . feigned himself mad and scrabbled on the doors of the gate." "To scrabble" (modern Eng. "scrawl") is here to make unmeaning marks; tāwāh means "to make a mark" from tāw, "a mark," esp. as a cross (Ezk 9 4), a signature (Job 31 35, see RV), the name of the letter ת, originally made in the form of a cross; RVm has "made marks"; but LXX has tumpanízō, "to beat as a drum," which the Vulg, Ewald, Driver and others follow ("beat upon" or "drummed on the doors of the city," which seems more probable).

SCREECH, skrēch, OWL. See NIGHT-MONSTER.

SCRIBES, skrībz: The existence of law leads necessarily to a profession whose business is the study and knowledge of the law; at any rate, if the law is extensive and complicated. At the time of Ezra and probably for some time after, this was chiefly the business of the priests. Ezra was both priest and scholar (סֹפֵר, ṣōphēr). It was chiefly in the interest of the priestly cult that the most important part of the Pent was written. The priests were therefore also in the first instance the scholars and the guardians of the Law; but in the course of time this was changed. The more highly esteemed the Law became in the eyes of the people, the more its study and interpretation became a lifework by itself, and thus there developed a class of scholars who, though not priests, devoted themselves assiduously to the Law. These became known as the scribes, that is, the professional students of the Law. During the Hellenistic period, the priests, esp. those of the upper class, became tainted with the Hellenism of the age and frequently turned their attention to paganistic culture, thus neglecting the Law of their fathers more or less and arousing the scribes to opposition. Thus the scribes and not the priests were now the zealous defenders of the Law, and hence were the true teachers of the people. At the time of Christ, this distinction was complete. The scribes formed a solid profession which held undisputed sway over the thought of the people. In the NT they are usually called γραμματεῖς, grammateís, i.e. "students of the Scriptures," "scholars," corresponding to the Heb סֹפְרִים, ṣōph^{e}rīm = homines literati, those who make a profession of literary studies, which, in this case, of course, meant chiefly the Law. Besides this general designation, we also find the specific word νομικοί, nomikoí, i.e. "students of the Law," "lawyers" (Mt 22 35; Lk 7 30; 10 25; 11 45.52; 14 3); and in so far as they not only know the Law but also teach it they are called νομοδιδάσκαλοι, nomodidáskaloi, "doctors of the Law" (Lk 5 17; Acts 5 34).

The extraordinary honors bestowed on these scholars on the part of the people are expressed in their honorary titles. Most common was the appellative "rabbi" = "my lord" (Mt 23 7 and otherwise). This word of polite address gradually became a title. The word "rabboni" (Mk 10 51; Jn 20 16) is an extensive form, and was employed by the disciples to give expression to their veneration of Christ. In the Gr NT "rabbi" is tr^d as κύριε, kúrie (Mt 8 2.6.8.21.25 and otherwise), or διδάσκαλε, didáskale (Mt 8 19 and otherwise), in Lk by ἐπιστάτα, epistáta (Lk 5 5; 8 24.45; 9 33.49; 17 13). Besides these, we find πατήρ, patḗr, "father," and καθηγήτης, kathēgḗtēs, "teacher" (Mt 23 9 f).

From their students the rabbis demanded honors even surpassing those bestowed on parents. "Let the honor of thy friend border on the honor of thy teacher, and the honor of thy teacher on the fear of God" ('Ābhōth 4 12). "The honor of thy teacher must surpass the honor bestowed on thy father; for son and father are both in duty bound to honor the teacher" (K^{e}rīthōth 6 9). Everywhere the rabbis demanded the position of first rank (Mt 23 6 f; Mk 12 38 f; Lk 11 43; 20 46). Their dress equaled that of the nobility. They wore στολαί, stolaí, "tunics," and these were the mark of the upper class.

Since the scribes were lawyers (see LAWYER), much of their time was occupied in teaching and in judicial functions, and both these activities must be pursued gratuitously. Rabbi Zadok said: "Make the knowledge of the Law neither a crown in which to glory nor a spade with which to dig." Hillel used to say: "He who employs the crown [of the Law] for external purposes shall dwindle." That the judge should not receive presents or bribes was written in the Law (Ex 23 8; Dt 16 19); hence the Mish said: "If anyone accept pay for rendering judgment, his judgment is null and void." The rabbis were therefore obliged to make their living by other means. Some undoubtedly had inherited wealth; others pursued a handicraft besides their study of the Law. Rabbi Gamaliel II emphatically advised the pursuit of a business in addition to the pursuit of the Law. It is well known that the apostle Paul kept up his handicraft even after he had become a preacher of the gospel (Acts 18 3; 20 34; 1 Cor 4 12; 9 6; 2 Cor 11 7; 1 Thess 2 9; 2 Thess 3 8), and the same is reported of many rabbis. But in every instance the pursuit of the Law is represented as the worthier, and warning is given not to overestimate the value of the ordinary avocation. It was a saying of Hillel: "He that devotes himself to trade will not become wise." The principle of gratuity was probably carried out in practice only in connection with the judicial activity of the scribes; hardly in connection with their work as teachers. Even the Gospels, in spite of the admonition that the disciples should give without pay because they had received without pay (Mt 10 8), nevertheless also state that the workman is worthy of his hire (Mt 10 10; Lk 10 7); and Paul (1 Cor 9 14) states it as his just due that he receive his livelihood from those to whom he preaches the gospel, even though he makes use of this right only in exceptional cases (1 Cor 9 3–18; 2 Cor 11 8.9; Gal 6 6; Phil 4 10.18). Since this appears to have been the thought of the times, we are undoubtedly justified in assuming that the Jewish teachers of the Law also demanded pay for their services. Indeed, the admonitions above referred to, not to make instruction in the Law the object of self-interest, lead to the conclusion that gratuity was not the rule; and in Christ's philippics against the scribes and Pharisees He makes special mention of their greed (Mk 12 40; Lk 16 14; 20 47). Hence, even though they ostensibly gave instruction in the Law gratuitously, they must have practised methods by which they indirectly secured their fees.

Naturally the place of chief influence for the scribes up to the year 70 AD was Judaea. But not only there were they to be found. Wherever the zeal for the law of the fathers was a perceptible force, they were indispensable; hence we find them also in Galilee (Lk 5 17) and in the Diaspora. In the Jewish epitaphs in Rome, dating from the latter days of the empire, grammateis are frequently mentioned; and the Bab scribes of the 5th and 6th cents. were the authors of the most monumental work of rabbinical Judaism—the Talmud.

Since the separation of the Pharisaic and the Sadducean tendencies in Judaism, the scribes generally belonged to the Pharisaic class; for this latter is none other than the party which recognized the interpretations or "traditions" which the scribes in the course of time had developed out of the body of the written Law and enforced upon the people as the binding rule of life. Since, however, "scribes" are merely "students of the Law," there must also have been scribes of the Sadducee type; for it is not to be imagined that this party, which recognized only the written Law as binding, should not have had some opposing students in the other class. Indeed, various passages of the NT which speak of the "scribes of the Pharisees" (Mk 2 16; Lk 5 30; Acts 23 9) indicate that there were also "scribes of the Sadducees."

Under the reign and leadership of the scribes, it became the ambition of every Israelite to know more or less of the Law. The aim of education in family, school and synagogue was to make the entire people a people of the Law. Even the common laborer should know what was written in the Law; and not only know it, but also do it. His entire life should be governed according to the norm of the Law, and, on the whole, this purpose was realized in a high degree. Jos avers: "Even though we be robbed of our riches and our cities and our other goods, the Law remains our possession forever. And no Jew can be so far removed from the land of his fathers nor will he fear a hostile commander to such a degree that he would not fear his Law more than his commander." So loyal were the majority of the Jews toward their Law that they would gladly endure the tortures of the rack and even death for it. This frame of mind was due almost wholly to the systematic and persistent instruction of the scribes.

The motive underlying this enthusiasm for the Law was the belief in Divine retribution in the strictest judicial sense. The prophetic idea of a covenant which God had made with His select people was interpreted purely in the judicial sense. The covenant was a contract through which both parties were mutually bound. The people are bound to observe the Divine Law literally and conscientiously; and, in return for this, God is in duty bound to render the promised reward in proportion to the services rendered. This applies to the people as a whole as well as to the individual. Services and reward must always stand in mutual relation to each other. He who renders great services may expect from the justice of God that he will receive great returns as his portion, while, on the other hand, every transgression also must be followed by its corresponding punishment.

The results corresponded to the motives. Just as the motives in the main were superficial, so the results were an exceedingly shallow view of religious and moral life. Religion was reduced to legal formalism. All religious and moral life was dragged down to the level of law, and this must necessarily lead to the following results: (1) The individual is governed by a norm, the application of which could have only evil results when applied in this realm. Law has the purpose of regulating the relations of men to each other according to certain standards. Its object is not the individual, but only the body of society. In the law, the individual must find the proper rule for his conduct toward society as an organism. This is a matter of obligation and of government on the part of society. But religion is not a matter of government; where it is found, it is a matter of freedom, of choice, and of conduct. (2) By reducing the practice of religion to the form of law, all acts are placed on a par with each other. The motives are no longer taken into consideration, but only the deed itself. (3) From this it follows that the highest ethical attainment was the formal satisfaction of the Law, which naturally led to finical literalism. (4) Finally, moral life must, under such circumstances, lose its unity and be split up into manifold precepts and duties. Law always affords opportunity for casuistry, and it was the development of this in the guidance of the Jewish religious life through the "precepts of the elders" which called forth Christ's repeated denunciation of the work of the scribes.

SCRIP, skrip: A word connected with "scrap," and meaning a "bag," either as made from a "scrap" (of skin) or as holding "scraps" (of food, etc). AV has "scrip" in 1 S 17 40 and 6 t in NT; ERV has "wallet" in the NT, but retains "scrip" in 1 S 17 40; ARV has "wallet" throughout. See Bag.

SCRIPTURE, skrip′t̬ûr (ἡ γραφή, hē graphḗ, pl. αἱ γραφαί, hai graphaí): The word means "writing." In the OT it occurs in AV only once, "the scripture of truth," in Dnl 10 21, where it is more correctly rendered in RV, "the writing of truth." The reference is not to Holy Scripture, but to the book in which are inscribed God's purposes. In the NT, "scripture" and "scriptures" stand regularly for the OT sacred books regarded as "inspired" (2 Tim 3 16), "the oracles of God" (Rom 3 2). Cf on this usage Mt 21 42; 22 29; Mk 12 10; Lk 4 21; 24 27.32.45; Jn 5 39; 10 35; Acts 8 32; 17 2.11; Rom 15 4; 16 26, etc; in Rom 1 2, "holy scriptures." See Bible. The expression "holy scriptures" in 2 Tim 3 15 AV represents different words (hierá grámmata) and is properly rendered in RV "sacred writings." In 2 Pet 3 16, the term "scriptures" is extended to the Epp. of Paul. In Jas 4 5, the words occur: "Think ye that the scripture speaketh in vain? Doth the spirit which he made to dwell in us long unto envying?" The passage is probably rather a summary of Scripture teaching than intended as a direct quotation. Others (e.g. Westcott) think the word is used in a wide sense of a Christian hymn. James Orr

SCROLL, skrōl. See Roll.

SCUM, skum (חֶלְאָה, ḥel'āh; LXX ἰός, iós, "poison" or "verdigris"; cf Plato Rep. 609*a*): The word is only found in Ezk 24 6.11.12, where RV translates it "rust." The fact, however, that the caldron is of brass and therefore not liable to rust, and the astonishment expressed that the fire did not remove it (ver 12), would seem to point to the preferability of the tr "scum," the residue of dirt adhering to the caldron from previous use.

SCURVY, skûr′vi (גָּרָב, gārābh; ψώρα ἀγρία, psôra agría [Lev 21 20; 22 22]): This word is used to denote an itchy, scaly disease of the scalp, probably any of the parasitic diseases which are known as tinea, porrigo or impetigo. These cases have no relation whatever to the disease now known as scorbutus or scurvy. The name was probably derived from its scaliness, and the old Gr physicians believed these diseases to be peculiarly intractable.

The name "Gareb" is used in Jer 31 39 as the place-name of a hill at or near the southeastern corner of Jerus, probably from the bare roughness of the surface of its slope at the southern end of the Wâdy er-Rabābi. Another hill of this name is mentioned near Shiloh in the Talm, and the name is given to one of David's warriors (2 S 23 38).

Scurvy etymologically means any condition of scaliness of skin which can be scraped off, such as dandruff. Alex. Macalister

SCYTHIANS, sith′i-anz (οἱ Σκύθαι, hoi Skúthai): The word does not occur in the Heb of the OT, but LXX of Jgs 1 27 inserts Σκυθῶν πόλις, Skuthôn pólis (Scythopolis), in explanation, as being the same as Beth-shean. The same occurs in Apoc (Jth 3 10; 1 Macc 12 29), and the S. as a people in 2 Macc 4 47, and the adj. in 3 Macc 7 5. The people are also mentioned in the NT (Col 3 11), where, as in Macc, the fact that they were barbarians is implied. This is clearly set forth in classical writers, and the description of them given by Herodotus in book iv of his history represents a race of savages, inhabiting a region of rather indefinite boundaries, north of the Black and Caspian seas and the Caucasus Mountains. They were nomads who neither plowed nor sowed (iv.19), moving about in wagons and carrying their dwellings with them (ib, 46); they had the most filthy habits and never washed in water (ib, 75); they drank the blood of the first enemy killed in battle, and made napkins of the scalps and drinking bowls of the skulls of the slain (ib, 64–65). Their deities were many of them identified with those of the Greeks, but the most characteristic rite was the worship of the naked sword (ib, 62), and they sacrificed every hundredth man taken in war to this deity. War was their chief business, and they were a terrible scourge to the nations of Western Asia. They broke through the barrier of the Caucasus in 632 BC and swept down like a swarm of locusts upon Media and Assyria, turning the fruitful fields into a desert; pushing across Mesopotamia, they ravaged Syria and were about to invade Egypt when Psammitichus I, who was besieging Ashdod, bought them off by rich gifts, but they remained in Western Asia for 28 years, according to Herodotus. It is supposed that a company of them settled in Beth-shean, and from this circumstance it received the name Scythopolis. Various branches of the race appeared at different times, among the most noted of which were the Parthians (q.v.). SEA, sē (יָם, yām; θάλασσα, thálassa; in Acts 27 5 πέλαγος, pélagos): The Mediterranean is called ha-yām ha-gādhōl, "the great sea" (Nu 34 6; Josh 1 4; Ezk 47 10, etc); ha-yām hā-'aḥărōn, "the hinder," or "western sea" (Dt 11 24; 34 2; Joel 2 20; Zec 14 8); yām pᵉlishtīm, "the sea of the Philis" (Ex 23 31); AV translates yām yāphō' in Ezr 3 7 by "sea of Joppa," perhaps rightly.

The Dead Sea is called yām ha-melaḥ, "the Salt Sea" (Nu 34 3; Dt 3 17; Josh 3 16, etc); ha-yām ha-ḳadhmōnī, "the east sea" (Ezk 47 18; Joel 2 20; Zec 14 8); yām hā-'ărābhāh, "the sea of the Arabah" (Dt 3 17; Josh 3 16; 12 3; 2 K 14 25).

The Red Sea is called yām ṣūph, lit. "sea of weeds" (Ex 10 19; Nu 14 25; Dt 1 1; Josh 2 10; Jgs 11 16; 1 K 9 26; Neh 9 9; Ps 106 7; Jer 49 21, etc); ἐρυθρὰ θάλασσα, eruthrá thálassa, lit. "red sea" (Wisd 19 7; Acts 7 36; He 11 29); yām miçrayim, "the Egyp sea" (Isa 11 15).

Yām is used of the Nile in Nah 3 8 and probably also in Isa 19 5, as in modern Arab. baḥr, "sea," is used of the Nile and its affluents. Yām is often used for "west" or "westward," as "look from the place where thou art, ... westward" (Gen 13 14); "western border" (Nu 34 6). Yām is used for "sea" in general (Ex 20 11); also for "molten sea" of the temple (1 K 7 23).

The Sea of Galilee is called kinnereth, "Chinnereth" (Nu 34 11); kinărōth, "Chinneroth" (Josh 11 2); kinnᵉrōth, "Chinneroth" (1 K 15 20); yām kinnereth, "the sea of Chinnereth" (Nu 34 11; Josh 13 27); yām kinnᵉrōth, "the sea of Chinneroth" (Josh 12 3); ἡ λίμνη Γεννησαρέτ, hē límnē Gennēsarét, "the lake of Gennesaret" (Lk 5 1); and τὸ ὕδωρ Γεννησάρ, tó húdōr Gennēsár, "the water of Gennesar" (1 Macc 11 67), from late Heb גִּנֵּסַר, ginēṣar, or גְּנֵיסַר, gᵉnēṣar; ἡ θάλασσα τῆς Γαλιλαίας, hē thálassa tḗs Galilaías, "the sea of Galilee" (Mt 4 18; 15 29; Mk 1 16; 7 31; Jn 6 1); ἡ θάλασσα τῆς Τιβεριάδος, hē thálassa tḗs Tiberiádos, "the sea of Tiberias" (Jn 21 1; cf Jn 6 1).

In Jer 48 32 we have yām ya'zēr, "the sea of Jazer." Jazer is a site E. of the Jordan, not satisfactorily identified (Nu 21 32; 32 1.3.35; Josh 13 25; 21 39; 2 S 24 5; 1 Ch 6 81; 26 31; Isa 16 8.9). See Sea of Jazer.

In midhbar yām, "the wilderness of the sea" (Isa 21 1), there may perhaps be a reference to the Pers Gulf. Alfred Ely Day

SEA-MEW, sē′mū (שַׁחַף, shaḥaph; λάρος, láros; Lat Larus canus): The sea-gull. Used by modern translators in the list of abominations in the place of the cuckoo (Lev 11 16; Dt 14 15). It is very probable that the sea-gull comes closer to the bird intended than the Cuckoo (q.v.). The sea-gull is a "slender" bird, but not "lean" as the root shaḥaph implies. However, with its stretch of wing and restless flight it gives this impression. Gulls are common all along the Mediterranean coast and around the Sea of Galilee. They are thought to have more intelligence than the average bird, and to share with some eagles, hawks, vultures and the raven the knowledge that if they find a mollusk they cannot break they can carry it aloft and drop it on the rocks. Only a wise bird learns this. Most feathered creatures pick at an unyielding surface a few times and then seek food elsewhere. There are two reasons why these birds went on the abomination lists. To a steady diet of fish they add carrion. Then they are birds of such nervous energy, so exhaustless in flight, so daring in flying directly into the face of fierce winds, that the Moslems believed them to be tenanted with the souls of the damned. Moses was reared and educated among the Egyptians, and the laws he formulated often are tinged by traces of his early life. History fails to record any instance of a man reared in Egypt who permitted the killing of a gull, ibis, or hoopoe. Gene Stratton-Porter

1. Names of the Sea

SEA, THE GREAT (הַיָּם הַגָּדוֹל, ha-yām ha-gādhōl): This is the name given to the Mediterranean, which formed the western boundary of Pal (Nu 34 6 f; Josh 15 12. 47; Ezk 47 19 f; 48 28). It is also called "the hinder sea" (Heb ha-yām hā-'aḥărōn), i.e. the western sea (Dt 11 24; 34 2; Joel 2 20; Zec 14 8), and "the sea of the Philis" (Ex 23 31), which, of course, applies esp. to the part washing the shore of Philistia, from Jaffa southward. Generally, when the word "sea" is used, and no other is definitely indicated, the Mediterranean is intended (Gen 49 13; Nu 13 29, etc). It was the largest sheet of water with which the Hebrews had any acquaintance. Its gleaming mirror, stretching away to the sunset, could be seen from many an inland height.

2. Israel and the Sea

It bulked large in the minds of the landsmen—for Israel produced few mariners—impressing itself upon their speech, so that "seaward" was the common term for "westward" (Ex 26 22; Josh 5 1, etc). Its mystery and wonder, the raging of the storm, and the sound of "sorrow on the sea," borne to their upland ears, infected them with a strange dread of its wide waters, to which the seer of Patmos gave the last Scriptural expression in his vision of the new earth, where "the sea is no more" (Rev 21 1).

3. The Coast Line

Along the coast lay the tribal territories assigned to Asher, Zebulun, Manasseh, Dan and Judah. Many of the cities along the shore they failed to possess, however, and much of the land. The coast line offered little facility for the making of harbors. The one seaport of which in ancient times the Hebrews seem to have made much use was Joppa—the modern Jaffa (2 Ch 2 16, etc). From this place, probably, argosies of Solomon turned their prows westward. Here, at least, "ships of Tarshish" were wont to set out upon their adventurous voyages (Jon 1 3). The ships on this sea figure in the beautiful vision of Isaiah (60 8 f). See Acco; Joppa.

4. The Sea in the NT

The boy Jesus, from the heights above Nazareth, must often have looked on the waters of the great sea, as they broke in foam on the curving shore, from the roots of Carmel to the point at Acre. Once only in His journeyings, so far as we know, did He approach the sea, namely on His ever-memorable visit to the "borders of Tyre and Sidon" (Mt 15 21; Mk 7 24). The sea, in all its moods, was well known to the great apostle of the Gentiles. The three shipwrecks, which he suffered (2 Cor 11 25), were doubtless due to the power of its angry billows over the frail craft of those old days. See Paul.

5. Debt of Palestine to the Sea

The land owes much to the great sea. During the hot months of summer, a soft breeze from the water springs up at dawn, fanning all the seaward face of the Central Range. At sunset the chilled air slips down the slopes and the higher strata drift toward the uplands, charged with priceless moisture, giving rise to the refreshing dews which make the Palestinian morning so sweet. See, further, Mediterranean Sea. W. Ewing

SEA, THE MOLTEN, mōl′t′n, or BRAZEN (יָם מוּצָק, yām mūçāḳ, יָם הַנְּחשֶׁת, yām ha-n^eḥōsheth): This was a large brazen (bronze) reservoir for water which stood in the court of Solomon's Temple between the altar and the temple porch, toward the S. (1 K 7 23–26; 2 Ch 4 2–5.10). The bronze from which it was made is stated in 1 Ch 18 8 to have been taken by David from the cities Tibhath and Cun. It replaced the laver of the tabernacle, and, like that, was used for storing the water in which the priests washed their hands and their feet (cf Ex 30 18; 38 8). It rested on 12 brazen (bronze) oxen, facing in four groups the four quarters of heaven. For particulars of shape, size and ornamentation, see Temple. The "sea" served its purpose till the time of Ahaz, who took away the brazen oxen, and placed the sea upon a pavement (2 K 16 17). It is recorded that the oxen were afterward taken to Babylon (Jer 52 20). The sea itself shared the same fate, being first broken to pieces (2 K 25 13.16).

SEAL, sēl (subst. חוֹתָם, ḥōthām, "seal," "signet," טַבַּעַת, ṭabba'ath, "signet-ring"; Aram. עִזְקָא, 'izḳā'; σφραγίς, sphragís; vb. חָתַם, ḥātham [Aram. חֲתַם, ḥătham]; σφραγίζω, sphragízō, κατασφραγίζομαι, katasphragízomai, "to seal"):

I. Literal Sense.—A seal is an instrument of stone, metal or other hard substance (sometimes set in a ring), on which is engraved some device or figure, and is used for making an impression on some soft substance, as clay or wax, affixed to a document or other object, in token of authenticity.

1. Prevalence in Antiquity

The use of seals goes back to a very remote antiquity, esp. in Egypt, Babylonia and Assyria. Herodotus (i.195) records the Bab custom of wearing signets. In Babylonia the seal generally took the form of a cylinder cut in crystal or some hard stone, which was bored through from end to end and a cord passed through it. The design, often accompanied by the owner's name, was engraved on the curved part. The signet was then suspended by the cord round the neck or waist (cf RV "cord" in Gen 38 18; "upon thy heart . . . . upon thine arm," i.e. one seal hanging down from the neck and another round the waist; Cant 8 6). In Egypt, too, as in Babylonia, the cylinder was the earliest form used for the purpose of a seal; but this form was in Egypt gradually superseded by the scarab (=beetle-shaped) as the prevailing type. Other forms, such as the cone-shaped, were also in use. From the earliest period of civilization the finger-ring on which some distinguishing badge was engraved was in use as a convenient way of carrying the signet, the earliest extant rings being those found in Egyp tombs. Other ancient peoples, such as the Phoenicians, also used seals. From the East the custom passed into Greece and other western countries. Devices of a variety of sorts were in use at Rome, both by the emperors and by private individuals. In ancient times, almost every variety of precious stones was used for seals, as well as cheaper material, such as limestone or terra-cotta. In the West wax came early into use as the material for receiving the impression of the seal, but in the ancient East clay was the medium used (cf Job 38 14). Pigment and ink also came into use.

2. Seals among the Hebrews

That the Israelites were acquainted with the use in Egypt of signets set in rings is seen in the statement that Pharaoh delivered to Joseph his royal signet as a token of deputed authority (Gen 41 41 f). They were also acquainted with the use of seals among the Persians and Medes (Est 3 12; 8 8.10; Dnl 6 17). The Hebrews themselves used them at an early period, the first recorded instance being Gen 38 18.25, where the patriarch Judah is said to have pledged his word to Tamar by leaving her his signet, cord and staff. We have evidence of engraved signets being in important use among them in early times in the description of the two stones on the high priest's ephod (Ex 28 11; 39 6), of his golden plate (Ex 28 36; 39 30), and breastplate (39 14). Ben-Sirach mentions as a distinct occupation the work of engraving on signets

(Sir 38 27). From the case of Judah and the common usage in other countries, we may infer that every Hebrew of any standing wore a seal. In the case of the signet ring, it was usual to wear it on one of the fingers of the right hand (Jer 22 24). The Hebrews do not seem to have developed an original type of signets. The seals so far discovered in Pal go to prove that the predominating type was the Egyptian, and to a less degree the Babylonian.

3. Uses of Sealing

(1) One of the most important uses of sealing in antiquity was to give a proof of authenticity and authority to letters, royal commands, etc. It served the purposes of a modern signature at a time when the art of writing was known to only a few. Thus Jezebel "wrote letters in Ahab's name, and sealed them with his seal" (1 K 21 8); the written commands of Ahasuerus were "sealed with the king's ring," "for the writing which is written in the king's name, and sealed with the king's ring, may no man reverse" (Est 8 8.10; 3 12). (2) Allied to this is the formal ratification of a transaction or covenant. Jeremiah sealed the deeds of the field which he bought from Hanamel (Jer 32 10–14; cf ver 44); Nehemiah and many others affixed their seal to the written covenant between God and His people (Neh 9 38; 10 1 ff). (3) An additional use was the preservation of books in security. A roll or other document intended for preservation was sealed up before it was deposited in a place of safety (Jer 32 14; cf the "book . . . . close sealed with seven seals," Rev 5 1). In sealing the roll, it was wrapped round with flaxen thread or string, then a lump of clay was attached to it impressed with a seal. The seal would have to be broken by an authorized person before the book could be read (Rev 5 2.5.9; 6 1.3, etc). (4) Sealing was a badge of deputed authority and power, as when a king handed over his signet ring to one of his officers (Gen 41 42; Est 3 10; 8 2; 1 Macc 6 15). (5) Closed doors were often sealed to prevent the entrance of any unauthorized person. So the door of the lion's den (Dnl 6 17; cf Bel ver 14). Herodotus mentions the custom of sealing tombs (ii.121). So we read of the chief priests and Pharisees sealing the stone at the mouth of Our Lord's tomb in order to "make the sepulchre sure" against the intrusion of the disciples (Mt 27 66). Cf the sealing of the abyss to prevent Satan's escape (Rev 20 3). A door was sealed by stretching a cord over the stone which blocked the entrance, spreading clay or wax on the cord, and then impressing it with a seal. (6) To any other object might a seal be affixed, as an official mark of ownership; e.g. a large number of clay stoppers of wine jars are still preserved, on which seal impressions of the cylinder type were stamped, by rolling the cylinder along the surface of the clay when it was still soft (cf Job 38 14).

Sealed Stone at Entrance to a Tomb.

II. Metaphorical Use of the Term.—The word "seal," both subst. and vb., is often used figuratively for the act or token of authentication, confirmation, proof, security or possession. Sin is said not to be forgotten by God, but treasured and stored up with Him against the sinner, under a seal (Dt 32 34; Job 14 17). A lover's signet is the emblem of love as an inalienable possession (Cant 8 6); an unresponsive maiden is "a spring shut up, a fountain sealed" (Cant 4 12). The seal is sometimes a metaphor for secrecy. That which is beyond the comprehension of the uninitiated is said to be as "a book that is sealed" (Isa 29 11 f; cf the book with seven seals, Rev 5 1 ff). Daniel is bidden to "shut up the words" of his prophecy "and seal the book, even to the time of the end," i.e. to keep his prophecy a secret till it shall be revealed (Dnl 12 4.9; cf Rev 10 4). Elsewhere it stands for the ratification of prophecy (Dnl 9 24). The exact meaning of the figure is sometimes ambiguous (as in Job 33 16; Ezk 28 12). In the NT the main ideas in the figure are those of authentication, ratification, and security. The believer in Christ is said to "set his seal to this, that God is true" (Jn 3 33), i.e. to attest the veracity of God, to stamp it with the believer's own endorsement and confirmation. The Father has sealed the Son, i.e. authenticated Him as the bestower of life-giving bread (Jn 6 27). The circumcision of Abraham was a "sign" and "seal," an outward ratification, of the righteousness of faith which he had already received while uncircumcised (Rom 4 11; cf the prayer offered at the circumcision of a child, "Blessed be He who sanctified His beloved from the womb, and put His ordinance upon his flesh, and sealed His offering with the sign of a holy covenant"; also Tg Cant 38: "The seal of circumcision is in your flesh as it was sealed in the flesh of Abraham"). Paul describes his act in making over to the saints at Jerus the contribution of the Gentiles as having "sealed to them this fruit" (Rom 15 28); the meaning of the phrase is doubtful, but the figure seems to be based on sealing as ratifying a commercial transaction, expressing Paul's intention formally to hand over to them the fruit (of his own labors, or of spiritual blessings which through him the Gentiles had enjoyed), and to mark it as their own property. Paul's converts are the "seal," the authentic confirmation, of his apostleship (1 Cor 9 2). God by His Spirit indicates who are His, as the owner sets his seal on his property; and just as documents are sealed up until the proper time for opening them, so Christians are sealed up by the Holy Spirit "unto the day of redemption" (Eph 1 13; 4 30; 2 Cor 1 22). Ownership, security and authentication are implied in the words, "The firm foundation of God standeth, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his" (2 Tim 2 19). The seal of God on the foreheads of His servants (Rev 7 2–4) marks them off as His own, and guarantees their eternal security, whereas those that "have not the seal of God on their foreheads" (Rev 9 4) have no such guaranty.

On the analogy of the rite of circumcision (see above), the term "seal" (sphragis) was at a very early period applied to Christian baptism. But there is no sufficient ground for referring such passages as Eph 1 13; 4 30; 2 Cor 1 22 to the rite of baptism (as some do). The use of the metaphor in connection with baptism came after NT times (early instances are given in Gebhardt and Lightfoot on 2 Clem 7 6). Harnack and Hatch maintain that the name "seal" for baptism was taken from the Gr mysteries, but Anrich and Sanday-Headlam hold that it was borrowed from the Jewish view of circumcision as a seal. See MYSTERY.

D. MIALL EDWARDS

SEALED, sēld, FOUNTAIN: These words, applied to the bride (Cant 4 12), find their explanation under SEAL (q.v.). Anything that was to be authoritatively protected was sealed. Where water was one of the most precious things, as in the East, fountains and wells were often sealed (Gen 29 3; Prov 5 15–18).

SEALSKIN, sēl′skin: The rendering of RV (Ex 25 5; Ezk 16 10) for עוֹר תַּחַשׁ, 'ōr taḥash, RVm "porpoise-skin," AV "badgers' skin." A seal, Monachus albiventer, is found in the Mediterranean, though not in the Red Sea, but it is likely that taḥash means the dugong, which is found in the Red Sea. See BADGER; PORPOISE.

SEAM, sēm, SEAMLESS, sēm′les: The coat or inner garment (χιτών, chitṓn) of Jesus is described in Jn 19 23 as "without seam" (ἄρραφος, árrhaphos), i.e. woven in one piece.

SEAR, sēr: In 1 Tim 4 2 for καυστηριάζω, kaustēriázō, "burn with a hot iron" (cf "cauterize"), AV "having their conscience seared with a hot iron," and RVm. "Seared" in this connection means "made insensible," like the surface of a deep burn after healing. The vb., however, probably means "brand" (so RV). "Criminals are branded on their forehead, so that all men may know their infamy. The consciences of certain men are branded just as truly, so that there is an inward consciousness of hypocrisy." See the comms.

SEARCH, sûrch: Some peculiar senses are: (1) In the books of Moses, esp. in Nu, "searching out the land" means to spy out (רַגֵּל, raggēl), to investigate carefully, to examine with a view to giving a full and accurate report on. (2) When applied to the Scriptures, as in Ezr 4 15.19 (בַּקֵּר, baḳḳēr); Jn 5 39; 1 Pet 1 11 (ἐραυνάω, eraunáō), it means to examine, to study out the meaning. In Acts 17 11, RV substitutes "examining" for the "searched" of AV. See SEARCHINGS. (3) "Search out" often means to study critically, to investigate carefully, e.g. Job 8 8; 29 16; Eccl 1 13; Lam 3 40; Mt 2 8; 1 Cor 2 10; 1 Pet 1 10. (4) When the word is applied to God's searching the heart or spirit, it means His opening up, laying bare, disclosing what was hidden, e.g. 1 Ch 28 9; Ps 44 21; 139 1; Prov 20 27; Jer 17 10; Rom 8 27.

G. H. GERBERDING

SEARCH THE SCRIPTURES: The sentence beginning with ἐραυνᾶτε, eraunáte, in Jn 5 39 AV has been almost universally regarded as meaning "Search the scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life." But one cannot read as far as δοκεῖτε, dokeíte, "ye think," without feeling that there is something wrong with the ordinary version. This vb. is at least a disturbing element in the current of thought (if not superfluous), and only when the first vb. is taken as an indicative does the meaning of the writer become clear. The utterance is not a command, but a declaration: "Ye search the scriptures, because ye think that in them," etc. Robert Barclay as early as 1675, in his Apology for the True Christian Divinity (91 ff), refers to two scholars before him who had handed down the correct tradition: "Moreover, that place may be taken in the indicative mood, Ye search the Scriptures; which interpretation the Gr word will bear, and so Pasor tr^{d} it: which by the reproof following seemeth also to be the more genuine interpretation, as Cyrillus long ago hath observed." So Dr. Edwin A. Abbott, in his Johannine Grammar (London, 1906, §2439 [i]). See also Transactions American Philological Association, 1901, 64 f. J. E. HARRY

SEARCHINGS, sûr′chingz (חִקְרֵי[לֵב], ḥiḳrē [lēbh], from ḥāḳar, to "search," "explore," "examine thoroughly"): In the song of Deborah the Reubenites are taunted because their great resolves of heart, ḥiḳeḳē lēbh, led to nothing but great "searchings" of heart, ḥiḳrē lēbh, and no activity other than to remain among their flocks (Jgs 5 15 f). The first of the two Heb expressions so emphatically contrasted (though questioned by commentators on the authority of 5 MSS as a corruption of the second) can with reasonable certainty be interpreted "acts prescribed by one's understanding" (cf the expressions ḥākham lēbh, nebhōn lēbh, in which the heart is looked upon as the seat of the understanding). The second expression may mean either irresolution or hesitation based on selfish motives, as the heart was also considered the seat of the feelings, or answerability to God (cf Jer 17 10; Prov 25 3); this rendering would explain the form liphelaghōth in Jgs 5 16, lit. 'for the water courses of Reuben, great the searchings of heart!'

NATHAN ISAACS

SEASONS, sē′z′nz (summer: קַיִץ, ḳayiç, Chald קַיִט, ḳayiṭ [Dnl 2 35]; θέρος, théros; winter: סְתָו, ṣethāw [Cant 2 11], חֹרֶף, ḥōreph; χειμών, cheimṓn): The four seasons in Pal are not so marked as in more northern countries, summer gradually fading into winter and winter into summer. The range of temperature is not great. In the Bible we have no reference to spring or autumn; the only seasons mentioned are "summer and winter" (Gen 8 22; Ps 74 17; Zec 14 8).

Winter is the season of rain lasting from November to May. "The winter is past; the rain is over" (Cant 2 11). See RAIN. The temperature at sea-level in Pal reaches freezing-point occasionally, but seldom is less than 40° F. On the hills and mountains it is colder, depending on the height. The people have no means of heating their houses, and suffer much with the cold. They wrap up their necks and heads and keep inside the houses out of the wind as much as possible. "The sluggard will not plow by reason of the winter" (Prov 20 4). Jesus in speaking of the destruction of Jerus says, "Pray ye that your flight be not in the winter" (Mt 24 20). Paul asks Timothy to "come before winter" (2 Tim 4 21) as navigation closed then and travel was virtually impossible.

Summer is very hot and rainless. "[When] the fig tree . . . . putteth forth its leaves, ye know that the summer is nigh" (Mk 13 28); "The harvest is past, the summer is ended" (Jer 8 20). It is the season of harvesting and threshing (Dnl 2 35). "He that gathereth in summer is a wise son" (Prov 10 5). See COLD; HEAT; ASTRONOMY, I, 5.

SEAT, sēt: This word is used to translate the Heb words מוֹשָׁב, mōshābh, שֶׁבֶת, shebheth, כִּסֵּא, kiṣṣē′, and תְּכוּנָה, tekhūnāh, once (Job 23 3). It translates the Gr word καθέδρα, kathédra (Mt 21 12; 23 2; Mk 11 15), and "chief seat" translates the compound word πρωτοκαθεδρία, prōtokathedría (Mt 23 6; Mk 12 39; Lk 20 46). In AV it translates θρόνος, thrónos (Lk 1 52; Rev 2 13; 4 4; 11 16; 13 2; 16 10), which RV renders "throne." It denotes a place or thing upon which one sits, as a chair, or stool (1 S 20 18; Jgs 3 20). It is used also of the exalted position occupied by men of marked rank or influence, either in good or evil (Mt 23 2; Ps 1 1). JESSE L. COTTON

SEATS, sēts, CHIEF. See CHIEF SEATS.

SEBA, sē′ba (סְבָא, ṣebhā′; Σαβά, Sabá [Gen 10 7; 1 Ch 1 9]; Gr ib, but B has Σαβάν, Sabán):

1. Forms of Name, and Parentage of Seba

The first son of Cush, his brothers being Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, and Sabtecha. In Ps 72 10 and Isa 43 3 (where the Gr has Σοήνη, Soḗnē), Seba is mentioned with Egypt and Ethiopia, and must therefore have been a southern people. In Isa 45 14 we meet with the gentilic form, סְבָאִים, ṣebhā′īm (Σαβαείμ, Sabaeím), rendered "Sabaeans," who are described as "men of stature" (i.e. tall), and were to come over to Cyrus in chains, and acknowledge that God was in him—their merchandise, and that of the Ethiopians, and the labor of Egypt, were to be his.

2. Position of the Nation

Their country is regarded as being, most likely, the district of Saba, N. of Adulis, on the west coast of the Red Sea. There is just a possibility that the Sabi River, stretching from the coast to the Zambesi and the Limpopo, which was utilized as a waterway by the states in that region, though, through silting, not suitable now, may contain a trace of the name, and perhaps testifies to still more southern extensions of the power and influence of the Sebaim. (See Th. Bent, The Ruined Cities of Mashonaland, 1892.) The ruins of this tract are regarded as being the work of others than the black natives of the country. Dillmann, however, suggests (on Gen 10 7) that the people of Seba were another branch of the Cushites E. of Napatha by the Arabian Sea, of which Strabo (xvi. 4, 8, 10) and Ptolemy (iv.7, 7 f) give information. See SHEBA and HDB, s.v. T. G. PINCHES

SEBAM, sē′bam (שְׂבָם, s^{e}bhām; Σεβαμά, Sebamá; AV Shebam): A town in the upland pasture land given to the tribes of Reuben and Gad. It is named along with Heshbon, Elealeh and Nebo (Nu 32 3). It is probably the same place as Sibmah (AV "Shibmah") in ver 38 (so also Josh 13 19). In the time of Isaiah and Jeremiah it was a Moabite town, but there is no record of how or when it was taken from Israel. It appears to have been famous for the luxuriance of its vines and for its summer fruits (Isa 16 8 f; Jer 48 32). Onom calls it a city of Moab in the land of Gilead which fell to the tribe of Reuben. Jerome (Comm. in Isa 5) says it was about 500 paces from Heshbon, and he describes it as one of the strong places of that region. It may be represented by the modern Sīmia, which stands on the south side of Wâdy Ḥesbān, about 2 miles from Ḥesbān. The ancient ruins are considerable, with large sarcophagi; and in the neighboring rock wine presses are cut (PEFM, "Eastern Pal," 221 f). W. EWING

SEBAT, se-bät′, sē′bat (Zec 1 7). See SHEBAT.

SECACAH, sḗ-kā′ka, sek′a-kä (סְכָכָה, ṣ^{e}khākhāh; B, Αἰχιοζά, Aichiozá, A, Σοχοχά, Sochochá): One of the six cities "in the wilderness of Judah" (Josh 15 61), that is in the uncultivated lands to the W. of the Dead Sea, where a scanty pasturage is still obtained by wandering Bedouin tribes. There are many signs in this district of more settled habitation in ancient times, but the name Secacah is lost. Conder proposed Kh. ed Diḳḳeh (also called Kh. es Siḳḳeh), "the ruin of the path," some 2 miles S. of Bethany. Though an ancient site, it is too near the inhabited area; the name, too, is uncertain (PEF, III, 111, Sh XVII). E. W. G. MASTERMAN

SECHENIAS, sek-ḗ-nī′as:

(1) (A, Σεχενίας, Sechenías; omitted in B and Swete): 1 Esd 8 29="Shecaniah" in Ezr 8 3; the arrangement in Ezr is different.

(2) (A, Sechenias, but B and Swete, Εἰεχονίας, Eiechonías): Name of a person who went up at the head of a family in the return with Ezra (1 Esd 8 32)="Shecaniah" in Ezr 8 5.

SECHU, sē′kū (שֵׂכוּ, sēkhū). See SECU.

SECOND COMING, sek′und kum′ing. See PAROUSIA; ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT, V.

SECOND DEATH. See DEATH; ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT, X, (6).

SECOND SABBATH. See SABBATH, SECOND.

SECONDARILY, sek′un-da-ri-li: AV for δεύτερον, deúteron (1 Cor 12 28). Probably without distinction from "secondly" (so RV, and so AV also for deuteron in Sir 23 23). Still AV may have wished to emphasize that the prophets have a lower rank than the apostles.

SECRET, sē′kret: In Ezk 7 22, EV has "secret place" for צָפַן, çāphan, "hide," "treasure." A correct tr is, "They shall profane my cherished place" (Jerus), and there is no reference to the Holy of Holies. The other uses of "secret" in RV are obvious, but RV's corrections of AV in Jgs 13 18; 1 S 5 9; Job 15 11 should be noted.

SECT, sekt (αἵρεσις, haíresis): "Sect" (Lat secta, from sequi, "to follow") is in the NT the tr of hairesis, from hairéō, "to take," "to choose"; also tr^d "heresy," not heresy in the later ecclesiastical sense, but a school or party, a sect, without any bad meaning attached to it. The word is applied to schools of philosophy; to the Pharisees and Sadducees among the Jews who adhered to a common religious faith and worship; and to the Christians. It is tr^d "sect" (Acts 5 17, of the Sadducees; 15 5, of the Pharisees; 24 5, of the Nazarenes; 26 5, of the Pharisees; 28 22, of the Christians); also RV 24 14 (AV and ERVm "heresy"), "After the Way which they call a sect, so serve I the God of our fathers" (just as the Pharisees were "a sect"); it is tr^d "heresies" (1 Cor 11 19, m "sects," ARV "factions," m "Gr 'heresies'"; ERV reverses the ARV text and margin; Gal 5 20, ARV "parties," m "heresies"; ERV reverses text and margin; 2 Pet 2 1, "damnable heresies," RV "destructive heresies," m "sects of perdition"); the "sect" in itself might be harmless; it was the teaching or principles which should be followed by those sects that would make them "destructive." Hairesis occurs in 1 Macc 8 30 ("They shall do it at their pleasure," i.e. "choice"); cf LXX Lev 22 18.21. See HERESY. W. L. WALKER

SECU, sē′kū (שֵׂכוּ, sēkhū; B, ἐν τῷ Σεφεί, en tō̂ Sepheí, A, ἐν Σοκχώ, en Sokchō̂; AV Sechu): This name occurs only in the account of David's visit to Samuel (1 S 19 22). Saul, we are told, went to "Ramah, and came to the great well that is in Secu," where he inquired after Samuel and David. It evidently lay between the residence of Saul at Gibeah and Ramah. It is impossible to come to any sure conclusion regarding it. Conder suggested its identification with Khirbet Suweikeh, which lies to the S. of Bīreh. This is possible, but perhaps we should read with LXX B, "He came to the cistern of the threshing-floor that is on the bare hill" (en tō Sephei). The threshing-floors in the East are naturally on high exposed ground where this is possible, and often form part of the area whence water in the rainy season is conducted to cisterns. This might have been a place actually within the city of Ramah. W. EWING

SECUNDUS, sḗ-kun′dus (WH, Σέκουνδος, Sékoundos, TR, Σεκοῦνδος, Sekoúndos): A Thessalonian who was among those who accompanied Paul from Greece to Asia (Acts 20 4). They had preceded Paul and waited for him at Troas. If he were one of the representatives of the churches in Macedonia and Greece, intrusted with their contributions to Jerus (Acts 24 17; 2 Cor 8 23), he probably accompanied Paul as far as Jerus. The name is found in a list of politarchs on a Thessalonian inscription.

SECURE, sḗ-kūr′, SECURITY, sḗ-kū′ri-ti: The word bāṭaḥ and its derivatives in Heb point to security, either real or imaginary. Thus we read of a host that "was secure" (Jgs 8 11) and of those "that provoke God [and] are secure" (Job 12 6); but also of a security that rests in hope and is safe (Job 11 18). The NT words ποιέω ἀμερίμνους, poiéō amerímnous, used in Mt 28 14 [AV "secure you"], guarantee the safety of the soldiers, who witnessed against themselves, in the telling of the story of the disappearance of the body of Christ.

Securely is used in the sense of "trustful," "not anticipating danger" (Prov 3 29; Mic 2 8; Ecclus 4 15).

The word ἱκανόν, hikanón, tr^{d} security (Acts 17 9), may stand either for a guaranty of good behavior exacted from, or for some form of punishment inflicted on, Jason and his followers by the rulers of Thessalonica. HENRY E. DOSKER

SEDECIAS, sed-ė-sī′as: AV=RV SEDEKIAS (q.v.).

SEDEKIAS, sed-ė-kī′as:

(1) (B A, Σεδεκίας, Sedekías; AV Zedechias): 1 Esd 1 46 (44)=Zedekiah king of Judah; also in Bar 1 8 where AV reads "Sedecias."

(2) In Bar 1 1 (AV "Sedecias"), an ancestor of Baruch, "the son of Asadias," sometimes (but incorrectly) identified with the false prophet "Zedekiah the son of Maaseiah" (Jer 29 21).

SEDITION, sė-dish′un: The tr in Ezr 4 15.19 for אֶשְׁתַּדּוּר, 'eshtaddūr, "struggling," "revolt"; in 2 Esd 15 16 for inconstabilitio, "instability," with "be seditious" for στασιάζω, stasiázō, "rise in rebellion" in 2 Macc 14 6. In addition, AV has "sedition" for στάσις, stásis, "standing up," "revolt" (RV "insurrection") in Lk 23 19.25; Acts 24 5, with διχοστασία, dichostasía, "a standing asunder" (RV "division") in Gal 5 20. As "sedition" does not include open violence against a government, the word should not have been used in any of the above cases.

SEDUCE, sė-dūs′, SEDUCER, sė-dūs′ẽr (Hiphil of טָעָה, ṭā'āh, or תָּעָה, tā'āh, "to err"; of פָּתָה, pāthāh, "to be simple"; πλανάω, planáō, ἀποπλανάω, apoplanáō, "to lead astray"): (1) The word "seduce" is only used in the Bible in its general meaning of "to lead astray," "to cause to err," as from the paths of truth, duty or religion. It occurs in AV and RV Ezk 13 10; 2 K 21 9; 1 Tim 4 1; Rev 2 20; in AV only, Prov 12 26 (RV "causeth to err"); Isa 19 13 (RV "caused to go astray"); Mk 13 22; 1 Jn 2 26 (RV "lead astray"). The noun "seducer" (2 Tim 3 13 AV, γόης, góēs) is correctly changed in RV into "impostor." (2) It is not found in its specific sense of "to entice a female to surrender her chastity." Yet the crime itself is referred to and condemned.

Three cases are to be distinguished: (a) The seduction of an unbetrothed virgin: In this case the seducer according to JE (Ex 22 16 f) is to be compelled to take the virgin as his wife, if the father consents, and to pay the latter the usual purchase price, the amount of which is not defined. In the Deuteronomic Code (Dt 22 28) the amount is fixed at 50 shekels, and the seducer forfeits the right of divorce. (b) The seduction of a betrothed virgin: This case (Dt 22 23–27; not referred to in the other codes) is treated as virtually one of adultery, the virgin being regarded as pledged to her future husband as fully as if she were formally married to him; the penalty therefore is the same as for adultery, viz. death for both parties (except in the case where the girl can reasonably be acquitted of blame, in which case the man only is put to death). (c) The seduction of a betrothed bondmaid (mentioned only in Lev 19 20–22): Here there is no infliction of death, because the girl was not free; but the seducer shall make a trespass offering, besides paying the fine. See CRIMES; PUNISHMENTS.

D. MIALL EDWARDS

SEE, sē: In addition to the ordinary sense of perceiving by the eye, we have (1) חָזָה, ḥāzāh, "to see" (in vision): "Words of Amos . . . . which he saw concerning Israel" (Am 1 1). The revelation was made to his inward eye. "The word of Jeh . . . . which he [Micah] saw concerning Samaria" (Mic 1 1), describing what he saw in prophetic vision (cf Hab 1 1); see REVELATION, III, 4; (2) ὁράω, horáō, "to take heed": "See thou say nothing" (Mk 1 44); (3) εἶδον, eídon, "to know," "to note with the mind": "Jesus saw that he answered discreetly" (Mk 12 34); (4) θεωρέω, theōréō, "to view," "to have knowledge or experience of": "He shall never see death" (Jn 8 51). M. O. EVANS

SEED, sēd (OT always for זֶרַע, zera', Aram. [Dnl 2 43] זְרַע, z^{e}ra', except in Joel 1 17 for פְּרֻדוֹת, p^{e}rudhōth [pl. RV "seeds," AV "seed"], and Lev 19 19 [AV "mingled seed"] and Dt 22 9 [AV "divers seeds"] for כִּלְאַיִם, kil'ayim, lit. "two kinds," RV "two kinds of seed." Invariably in Gr Apoc and usually in the NT for σπέρμα, spérma, but Mk 4 26.27; Lk 8 5.11; 2 Cor 9 10 for σπόρος, spóros, and 1 Pet 1 23 for σπορά, sporá): (1) For "seed" in its literal sense see AGRICULTURE. Of interest is the method of measuring land by means of the amount of seed that could be sown on it (Lev 27 16). The prohibition against using two kinds of seed in the same field (Lev 19 19; Dt 22 9) undoubtedly rests on the fact that the practice had some connection with Canaanitish worship, making the whole crop "consecrated" (taboo). Jer 31 27 uses "seed of man" and "seed of beast" as a figure for the means by which God will increase the prosperity of Israel (i.e. "seed yielding men"). (2) For the transferred physiological application of the word to human beings (Lev 15 16, etc) see CLEAN; UNCLEAN. The conception of Christians as "born" or "begotten" of God (see REGENERATION) gave rise to the figure in 1 Pet 1 23; 1 Jn 3 9. If the imagery is to be stressed, the Holy Spirit is meant. In 1 Jn 3 9 a doctrine of certain Gnostics is opposed. They taught that by learning certain formulas and by submitting to certain rites, union with God and salvation could be attained without holiness of life. St. John's reply is that union with a righteous God is meaningless without righteousness as an ideal, even though shortcomings exist in practice (1 Jn 1 8). (3) From the physiological use of "seed" the transition to the sense of "offspring" was easy, and the word may mean "children" (Lev 18 21, etc) or even a single child (Gen 4 25; 1 S 1 11 RVm). Usually, however, it means the whole posterity (Gen 3 15, etc); cf "seed royal" (2 K 11 1, etc), and "Abraham's seed" (2 Ch 20 7, etc) or "the holy seed" (Ezr 9 2; Isa 6 13; 1 Esd 8 70; cf Jer 2 21) as designations of Israel. So "to show one's seed" (Ezr 2 59; Neh 7 61) is to display one's genealogy, and "one's seed" may be simply one's nation, conceived of as a single family (Est 10 3). From this general sense there developed a still looser use of "seed" as meaning simply "men" (Mal 2 15; Isa 1 4; 57 4; Wisd 10 15; 12 11, etc).

In Gal 3 16 St. Paul draws a distinction between "seeds" and "seed" that has for its purpose a proof that the promises to Abraham were realized in Christ and not in Israel. The distinction, however, overstresses the language of the OT, which never pluralizes zera' when meaning "descendants" (pl. only in 1 S 8 15; cf Rom 4 18; 9 7). But in an argument against rabbinical adversaries St. Paul was obliged to use rabbinical methods (cf Gal 4 25). For modern purposes it is probably best to treat such an exegetical method as belonging simply to the (now superseded) science of the times.

BURTON SCOTT EASTON

SEER, sē′ẽr, sēr: The word in EV represents two Heb words, רֹאֶה, rō'eh (1 S 9 9.11.18.19; 2 S 15 27; 1 Ch 9 22, etc), and חֹזֶה, ḥōzeh (2 S 24 11; 2 K 17 13; 1 Ch 21 9; 25 5; 29 29, etc). The former designation is from the ordinary vb. "to see"; the latter is connected with the vb. used of prophetic vision. It appears from 1 S 9 9 that "seer" (rō'eh) was the older name for those who, after the rise of the more regular orders, were called "prophets." It is not just, however, to speak of the "seers" or "prophets" of Samuel's time as on the level of mere fortune-tellers. What insight or vision they possessed is traced to God's Spirit. Samuel was the rō'eh by preëminence, and the name is little used after his time. Individuals who bear the title "seer" (ḥōzeh) are mentioned in connection with the kings and as historiographers (2 S 24 11; 1 Ch 21 9; 25 5; 29 29; 2 Ch 9 29; 12 15; 19 2, etc), and distinction is sometimes made between "prophets" and "seers" (2 K 17 13; 1 Ch 29 29, etc). Hävernick thinks that "seer" denotes one who does not belong to the regular prophetic order (Intro to OT, 50 ff, ET), but it is not easy to fix a precise distinction. See PROPHET, PROPHECY.

JAMES ORR

SEETHE, sēth: Old Eng. for "boil"; past tense, "sod" (Gen 25 29), past participle, "sodden" (Lam 4 10). See Ex 23 19 AV.

SEGUB, sē′gub (שְׂגוּב, s^{e}ghūbh [Ḳ^{e}rē], שְׂגִיב, s^{e}ghībh [K^{e}thībh]; B, Ζεγούβ, Zegoúb, A, Σεγούβ, Segoúb):

(1) The youngest son of Hiel, the rebuilder of Jericho (1 K 16 34). The death of Segub is probably connected with the primitive custom of laying foundations with blood, as, indeed, skulls were found built in with the brickwork when the tower of Bel at Nippur was excavated. See GEZER. If the death of the two sons was based on the custom just mentioned, the circumstance was deliberately obscured in the present account. The death of Segub may have been due to an accident in the setting up of the gates. In any event, tradition finally yoked the death of Hiel's oldest and youngest sons with a curse said to have been pronounced by Joshua on the man that should venture to rebuild Jericho (Josh 6 26).

(2) Son of Hezron and father of Jair (1 Ch 2 21).

HORACE J. WOLF

SEIR, sē′ir:

(1) (הַר שֵׂעִיר, har sē'īr, "Mt. Seir" [Gen 14 6, etc], אֶרֶץ שֵׂעִיר, 'ereç sē'īr [Gen 32 3, etc]; τὸ ὄρος Σηείρ, tó óros Sēeír, γῆ Σηείρ, gḗ Sēeír): In Gen 32 3 "the land of Seir" is equated with "the field of Edom." The Mount and the Land of Seir are alternative appellations of the mountainous tract which runs along the eastern side of the Arabah, occupied by the descendants of Esau, who succeeded the ancient Horites (Gen 14 6; 36 20), "cave-dwellers," in possession. For a description of the land see EDOM.

(2) (הַר שֵׂעִיר, har sē'īr; B, 'Ασσάρ, Assár, A, Σηείρ, Sēeír): A landmark on the boundary of Judah (Josh 15 10), not far from Kiriath-jearim and Chesalon. The name means "shaggy," and probably here denoted a wooded height. It may be that part of the range which runs N.E. from Sārīs by Ḳaryat el-'Anab and Biddu to the plateau of el-Jīb. Traces of an ancient forest are still to be seen here.

W. EWING

SEIRAH, sḗ-ī′ra, sē′i-ra (הַשְּׂעִירָה, ha-s^{e}'īrāh; B, Σετειρωθά, Seteirōthá, A, Σεειρῶθα, Seeirôtha; AV Seirath): The place to which Ehud escaped after his assassination of Eglon, king of Moab (Jgs 3 26). The name is from the same root as the foregoing, and probably applied to some shaggy forest. The quarries by which he passed are said to have been by Gilgal (ver 19), but there is nothing to guide us to an identification. Onom gives the name, but no indication of the site.

SEIRATH, sḗ-ī′rath, sē′i-rath. See SEIRAH.

SELA, sē′la (סֶלַע, ṣela', הַסֶּלַע, ha-ṣela' [with the art.]; πέτρα, pétra, ἡ πέτρα, hē pétra; AV Selah [2 K 14 7]): EV renders this as the name of a city in 2 K 14 7; Isa 16 1. In Jgs 1 36; 2 Ch 25 12; and Ob ver 3, it translates lit. "rock"; but RVm in each case "Sela." It is impossible to assume with Hull (HDB, s.v.) that this name, when it appears in Scripture, always refers to the capital of Edom, the great city in Wâdy Mûsa. In Jgs 1 36 its association with the Ascent of Akrabbim shuts us up to a position toward the southwestern end of the Dead Sea. Probably in that case it does not denote a city, but some prominent crag. Moore ("Judges," ICC, 56), following Buhl, would identify it with eṣ-Ṣâfieh, "a bare and dazzlingly white sandstone promontory 1,000 ft. high, E. of the mud flats of es-Sebkah, and 2 miles S. of the Dead Sea." A more probable identification is a high cliff which commands the road leading from Wâdy el-Milḥ, "valley of Salt," to Edom, over the pass of Akrabbim. This was a position of strategic importance, and if fortified would be of great strength. (In this passage "Edomites" must be read for "Amorites.") The victory of Amaziah was won in the Valley of Salt. He would naturally turn his arms at once against this stronghold (2 K 14 7); and it may well be the rock from the top of which he hurled his prisoners (2 Ch 25 12). He called it Jokteel, a name the meaning of which is obscure. Possibly it is the same as Jekuthiel (1 Ch 4 18), and may mean "preservation of God" (OHL, s.v.). No trace of this name has been found. The narratives in which the place is mentioned put identification with Petra out of the question.

"The rock" (RVm "Sela") in Ob ver 3, in the phrase "thou that dwellest in the clefts of the rock," is only a vivid and picturesque description of Mt. Edom. "The purple mountains into which the wild sons of Esau clambered run out from Syria upon the desert, some hundred miles by twenty, of porphyry and red sandstone. They are said to be the finest rock scenery in the world. 'Salvator Rosa never conceived so savage and so suitable a haunt for banditti.' . . . . The interior is reached by defiles so narrow that two horsemen may scarcely ride abreast, and the sun is shut out by the overhanging rocks. . . . . Little else than wild fowls' nests are the villages: human eyries perched on high shelves or hidden away in caves at the ends of the deep gorges" (G. A. Smith, The Book of the Twelve Prophets, II, 178 f).

In Isa 16 1; 42 11 RV, perhaps we have a reference to the great city of Petra. Jos (Ant, IV, vii, 1) tells us that among the kings of the Midianites who fell before Moses was one Rekem, king of Rekem (akre, or rekeme), the city deriving its name from its founder. This he says was the Arab. name; the Greeks called it Petra. Onom says Petra is a city of Arabia in the land of Edom. It is called Jechthoel; but the Syrians call it Rekem. Jokteel, as we have seen, must be sought elsewhere. There can be no doubt that Jos intended the city in Wâdy Mûsa. Its OT name was Bozrah (Am 1 12, etc). Wetzstein (Excursus in Delitzsch's Isa^{3}, 696 ff) hazards the conjecture that the complete ancient name was Bozrat has-Sela, "Bozrah of the Rock."

This "rose-red city half as old as Time"

was for long difficult of access, and the attempt to visit it was fraught with danger. In recent years, however, it has been seen by many tourists and exploring parties. Of the descriptions written the best is undoubtedly that of Professor Dalman of Jerus (Petra und seine Felsheiligtümer, Leipzig, 1908). An excellent account of this wonderful city, brightly and interestingly written, will be found in Libbey and Hoskins' book (The Jordan Valley and Petra, New York and London, 1905; see also National Geographic Magazine, May, 1907, Washington, D.C.). The ruins lie along the sides of a spacious hollow surrounded by the many-hued cliffs of Edom, just before they sink into the Arabah on the W. It is near the base of Jebel Harūn, about 50 miles from the Dead Sea, and just N. of the watershed between that sea and the Gulf of Akaba. The valley owes its modern name, Wâdy Mūsa, "Valley of Moses," to its connection with Moses in Mohammedan legends. While not wholly inaccessible from other directions, the two usual approaches are that from the S.W. by a rough path, partly artificial, and that from the E. The latter is by far the more important. The valley closes to the E., the only opening being through a deep and narrow defile, called the Sīk, "shaft," about a mile in length. In the bottom of the Sīk flows westward the stream that rises at 'Ain Mūsa. E. of the cleft is the village of Elji, an ancient site, corresponding to Gaia of Onom. Passing this village, the road threads its way along the shadowy winding gorge, overhung by lofty cliffs. When the valley is reached, a sight of extraordinary beauty and impressiveness opens to the beholder. The temples, the tombs, the theater, etc, hewn with great skill and infinite pains from the living rock, have defied to an astonishing degree the tooth of time, many of the carvings being as fresh as if they had been cut yesterday. An idea of the scale on which the work was done may be gathered from the size of the theater, which furnished accommodation for no fewer than 3,000 spectators.

Entrance to the Sīk.

Such a position could not have been overlooked in ancient times; and we are safe to assume that a city of importance must always have existed here. It is under the Nabataeans, however, that Petra begins to play a prominent part in history. This people took possession about the end of the 4th cent. BC, and continued their sway until overcome by Hadrian, who gave his own name to the city—Hadriana. This name, however, soon disappeared. Under the Romans Petra saw the days of her greatest splendor.

According to old tradition St. Paul visited Petra when he went into Arabia (Gal 1 17). Of this there is no certainty; but Christianity was early introduced, and the city became the seat of a bishopric. Under the Nabataeans she was the center of the great caravan trade of that time. The merchandise of the East was brought hither; and hence set out the caravans for the South, the West, and the North. The great highway across the desert to the Pers Gulf was practically in her hands. The fall of the Nabataean power gave Palmyra her chance; and her supremacy in the commerce of Northern Arabia dates from that time. Petra shared in the declining fortunes of Rome; and her death blow was dealt by the conquering Moslems, who desolated Arabia Petraea in 629–32 AD. The place now furnishes a retreat for a few poor Bedawy families. W. Ewing

SELA-HAMMAHLEKOTH, sē-la-ha-mä'lē-koth, -kōth (סֶלַע הַמַּחְלְקוֹת, ṣela' ha-maḥl^{e}ḳōth; πέτρα ἡ μερισθεῖσα, pétra hē meristheísa): "The rock of divisions (or, escape)" (1 S 23 28 m). "Saul . . . . pursued after David in the wilderness of Maon. And Saul went on this side of the mountain, and David and his men on that side of the mountain: and David made haste to get away for fear of Saul" (1 S 23 25.26). The name seems to survive in Wâdy Malāki, "the great gorge which breaks down between Carmel and Maon eastward, with vertical cliffs" (PEF, III, 314, Sh XXI).

SELAH, sē'la. See Music, II, 1.

SELED, sē'led (סֶלֶד, ṣeledh): A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 2 30 bis).

SELEMIA, sel-ē-mī'a: One of the swift scribes whose services Ezra was commanded to secure (2 Esd 14 24). The name is probably identical with Selemias of 1 Esd 9 34 (q.v.).

SELEMIAS, sel-ē-mī'as (Σελεμίας, Selemías): One of those who put away their "strange wives" (1 Esd 9 34) = "Shelemiah" in Ezr 10 39, and probably identical with "Selemia" in 2 Esd 14 24.

SELEUCIA, sē-lū'shi-a (Σελευκία, Seleukía): The seaport of Antioch from which it is 16 miles distant. It is situated 5 miles N. of the mouth of the Orontes, in the northwestern corner of a fruitful plain at the base of Mt. Rhosus or Pieria, the modern Jebel Mūsa, a spur of the Amanus Range. Built by Seleucus Nicator (d. 280 BC) it was one of the Syrian Tetrapolis, the others being Apameia, Laodicea and Antioch. The city was protected by nature on the mountain side, and, being strongly fortified on the S. and W., was considered invulnerable and the key to Syria (Strabo 751; Polyb. v.58). It was taken, however, by Ptolemy Euergetes (1 Macc 11 8) and remained in his family till 219 BC, when it was recovered for the Seleucids by Antiochus the Great, who then richly adorned it. Captured again by Ptolemy Philometor in 146 BC, it remained for a short time in the hands of the Egyptians. Pompey made it a free city in 64 BC in return for its energy in resisting Tigranes (Pliny, NH, v.18), and it was then greatly improved by the Romans, so that in the 1st cent. AD it was in a most flourishing condition.

On their first missionary journey Paul and Barnabas passed through it (Acts 13 4; 14 26), and though it is not named in Acts 15 30.39, this route is again implied; while it is excluded in Acts 15 3.

The ruins are very extensive and cover the whole space within the line of the old walls, which shows a circuit of four miles. The position of the Old Town, the Upper City and the suburbs may still be identified, as also that of the Antioch Gate, the Market Gate and the King's Gate, which last leads to the Upper City. There are rock-cut tombs, broken statuary and sarcophagi at the base of the Upper City, a position which probably represents the burial place of the Seleucids. The outline of a circus or amphitheater can also be traced, while the inner harbor is in perfect condition and full of water. It is 2,000 ft. long by 1,200 ft. broad, and covers 47 acres, being oval or pear-shaped. The passage seaward, now silted up, was protected by two strong piers or moles, which are locally named after Barnabas and Paul. The most remarkable of the remains, however, is the great water canal behind the city, which the emperor Constantius cut through the solid rock in 338 AD. It is 3,074 ft. long, has an average breadth of 20 ft., and is in some places 120 ft. deep. Two portions of 102 and 293 ft. in length are tunneled. The object of the work was clearly to carry the mountain torrent direct to the sea, and so protect the city from the risk of flood during the wet season.

Church synods occasionally met in Seleucia in the early centuries, but it gradually sank into decay, and long before the advent of Islam it had lost all its significance. W. M. Christie SELEUCIDAE, sē̇-lū′si-dē. See Seleucus.

SELEUCUS, sē̇-lū′kus (Σέλευκος, Séleukos):

(1) Seleucus I (Nicator, "The Conqueror"), the founder of the Seleucidae or House of Seleucus, was an officer in the grand and thoroughly equipped army, which was perhaps the most important part of the inheritance that came to Alexander the Great from his father, Philip of Macedon. He took part in Alexander's Asiatic conquests, and on the division of these on Alexander's death he obtained the satrapy of Babylonia. By later conquests and under the name of king, which he assumed in the year 306, he became ruler of Syria and the greater part of Asia Minor. His rule extended from 312 to 280 BC, the year of his death; at least the Seleucid era which seems to be referred to in 1 Macc 1 16 is reckoned from Seleucus I, 312 BC to 65 BC, when Pompey reduced the kingdom of Syria to a Rom province. He followed generally the policy of Alexander in spreading Gr civilization. He founded Antioch and its port Seleucia, and is said by Jos (Ant, XII, iii, 1) to have conferred civic privileges upon the Jews. The reference in Dnl 11 5 is usually understood to be to this ruler.

(2) Seleucus II (Callinicus, "The Gloriously Triumphant"), who reigned from 246 to 226 BC, was the son of Antiochus Soter and is "the king of the north" in Dnl 11 7–9, who was expelled from his kingdom by Ptolemy Euergetes.

(3) Seleucus III (Ceraunus, "Thunderbolt"), son of Seleucus II, was assassinated in a campaign which he undertook into Asia Minor. He had a short reign of rather more than 2 years (226–223 BC) and is referred to in Dnl 11 10.

(4) Seleucus IV (Philopator, "Fond of his Father") was the son and successor of Antiochus the Great and reigned from 187 to 175 BC. He is called "King of Asia" (2 Macc 3 3), a title claimed by the Seleucidae even after their serious losses in Asia Minor (see 1 Macc 8 6; 11 13; 12 39; 13 32). He was present at the decisive battle of Magnesia (190 BC). He was murdered by Heliodorus (q.v.), one of his own courtiers whom he had sent to plunder the Temple (2 Macc 3 1–40; Dnl 11 20).

For the connection of the above-named Seleucidae with the "ten horns" of Dnl 7 24, the commentators must be consulted.

Seleucus V (125–124 BC) and Seleucus VI (95–93 BC) have no connection with the sacred narrative. J. Hutchison

SELF-CONTROL, self-kon-trōl′ (ἐγκράτεια, egkráteia): Rendered in AV "temperance" (cf Lat temperatio and continentia), but more accurately "self-control," as in RV (Acts 24 25; Gal 5 23; 2 Pet 1 6); adj. of same, ἐγκρατής, egkratḗs, "self-controlled" (Tit 1 8 RV); cf vb. forms in 1 Cor 7 9, "have . . . . continency"; 9 25, the athlete "exerciseth self-control." Self-control is therefore repeatedly set forth in the NT as among the important Christian virtues.

SELF-RIGHTEOUSNESS, self-rī′chus-nes: A term that has come to designate moral living as a way of salvation; or as a ground for neglecting the redemptive work of Jesus Christ. The thought is present in the teaching of Jesus, who spoke one parable particularly to such as reckoned themselves to be righteous (Lk 18 9 ff). The Pharisees quite generally resented the idea of Jesus that all men needed repentance and they most of all. They regarded themselves as righteous and looked with contempt on "sinners." Paul in all his writings, esp. Rom 3; Gal 3; Eph 2; Phil 3, contrasts the righteousness that is God's gift to men of faith in Jesus Christ, with righteousness that is "of the law" and "in the flesh." By this latter he means formal conformity to legal requirements in the strength of unregenerate human nature. He is careful to maintain (cf Rom 7) that the Law is never really kept by one's own power. On the other hand, in full agreement with Jesus, Paul looks to genuine righteousness in living as the demand and achievement of salvation based on faith. God's gift here consists in the capacity progressively to realize righteousness in life (cf Rom 8 1 ff). See also Sanctification. William Owen Carver SELF-SURRENDER, self-su-ren′dẽr: The struggle between the natural human impulses of self-seeking, self-defence and the like, on the one hand, and the more altruistic impulse toward self-denial, self-surrender, on the other, is as old as the race. All religions imply some conception of surrender of self to deity, ranging in ethical quality from a heathen fanaticism which impels to complete physical exhaustion or rapture, superinduced by more or less mechanical means, to the high spiritual quality of self-sacrifice to the divinest aims and achievements. The Scriptures represent self-surrender as among the noblest of human virtues.

1. Illustrious Examples

I. In the OT.—In the OT self-surrender is taught in the early account of the first pair. Each was to be given to the other (Gen 2 24; 3 16*b*) and both were to be surrendered to God in perfect obedience (3 1–15). The faithful ones, throughout the Bible narratives, were characterized by self-surrender. Abraham abandons friends and native country to go to a land unknown to him, because God called him to do so (12 1). He would give up all his cherished hopes in his only son Isaac, at the voice of God (22 1–18). Moses, at the call of Jeh, surrenders self, and undertakes the deliverance of his fellow-Hebrews (Ex 3 1—4 13; cf He 11 25). He would be blotted out of God's book, if only the people might be spared destruction (Ex 32 32).

2. The Levitical System

The whole Levitical system of sacrifice may be said to imply the doctrine of self-surrender. The nation itself was a people set apart to Jeh, a holy people, a surrendered nation (Ex 19 5.6; 22 31; Lev 20 7; Dt 7 6; 14 2). The whole burnt offering implied the complete surrender of the worshipper to God (Lev 1). The ceremony for the consecration of priests emphasized the same fundamental doctrine (Lev 8); so also the law as to the surrender of the firstborn child (Ex 13 13 ff; 22 29).

3. The Prophets

In the Divine call to the prophets and in their life-work self-surrender is prominent. The seer, as such, must be receptive to the Divine impress, and as mouthpiece of God, he must speak not his own words, but God's: "Thus saith the Lord." He was to be a "man of God," a "man of the spirit." 'The hand of the Lord was upon me' (Ezk 1 3; 3 14) implies complete Divine mastery. Isaiah must submit to the Divine purification of his lips, and hearken to the inquiry, "Who will go for us?" with the surrendered response, "Here am I; send me" (Isa 6 8). Jeremiah must yield his protestations of weakness and inability to the Divine wisdom and the promise of endowment from above (Jer 1 1–10). Ezekiel surrenders to the dangerous and difficult task of becoming messenger to a rebellious house (Ezk 2 1—3 3). Jonah, after flight from duty, at last surrenders to the Divine will and goes to the Ninevites (Jon 3 3).

4. Post-exilic Examples

On the return of the faithful remnant from captivity, self-giving for the sake of Israel's faith was dominant, the people enduring great hardships for the future of the nation and the accomplishment of Jeh's purposes. This is the spirit of the great Messianic passage, Isa 53 7: "He was oppressed, yet when he was afflicted he opened not his mouth; as a lamb that is led to the slaughter, and as a sheep that before its shearers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth." Nehemiah surrendered position in Shushan to help reëstablish the returned exiles in Jerus (Neh 2 5). Esther was ready to surrender her life in pleading for the safety of her people (Est 4 16).

1. Christ's Teaching and Example

II. In the NT.—In the NT self-surrender is still more clearly set forth. Christ's teachings and example as presented in the Gospels, give to it special emphasis. It is a prime requisite for becoming His disciple (Mt 10 38 f; 16 24; Lk 9 23.24.59 f; 14 27.33; cf Mt 19 27; Mk 8 34). When certain of the disciples were called they left all and followed (Mt 4 20; 9 9; Mk 2 14; Lk 5 27 f). His followers must so completely surrender self, as that father, mother, kindred, and one's own life must be, as it were, hated for His sake (Lk 14 26). The rich young ruler must renounce self as an end and give his own life to the service of men (Mt 19 21; Mk 10 21; cf Lk 12 33). But this surrender of self was never a loss of personality; it was the finding of the true selfhood (Mk 8 35; Mt 10 39). Our Lord not only taught self-surrender, but practised it. As a child, He subjected Himself to His parents (Lk 2 51). Self-surrender marked His baptism and temptation (Mt 3 15; 4 1 ff). It is shown in His life of physical privation (8 20). He had come not to do His own will, but the Father's (Jn 4 34; 5 30; 6 38). He refuses to use force for His own deliverance (Mt 26 53; Jn 18 11). In His person God's will, not His own, must be done (Mt 26 29; Lk 22 42); and to the Father He at last surrendered His spirit (Lk 23 46). So that while He was no ascetic, and did not demand asceticism of His followers, He "emptied himself . . . . becoming obedient even unto death, yea, the death of the cross" (Phil 2 7 f; see KENOSIS).

2. Acts of Apostles

The early disciples practised the virtue of self-surrender. Counting none of their possessions their own, they gave to the good of all (Acts 2 44.45; 4 34.35.37). Stephen and others threw themselves into their witnessing with the perfect abandon of the martyr; and Stephen's successor, Paul, counted not his life dear unto himself that he might finish the Divinely appointed course (20 22–24).

3. Epistles of Paul

The Epp. are permeated with the doctrine of self-surrender. The Pauline Epp. are particularly full of it. The Christian life is conceived of as a dying to self and to the world—a dying with Christ, a crucifixion of the old man, that a new man may live (Gal 2 20; 6 14; Col 2 20; 3 3; Rom 6 6), so that no longer the man lives but Christ lives in him (Gal 2 20; Phil 1 21). The Christian is no longer his own but Christ's (1 Cor 6 19.20). He is to be a living sacrifice (Rom 12 1); to die daily (1 Cor 15 31). As a corollary to surrender to God, the Christian must surrender himself to the welfare of his neighbor, just as Christ pleased not Himself (Rom 15 3); also to leaders (1 Cor 16 16), and to earthly rulers (Rom 13 1).

4. Epistles of Peter

In the Epp. of Peter self-surrender is taught more than once. Those who were once like sheep astray now submit to the guidance of the Shepherd of souls (1 Pet 2 25). The Christian is to humble himself under the mighty hand of God (5 6); the younger to be subject to the elder (5 5); and all to civil ordinances for the Lord's sake (2 13).

So also in other Epp. The Christian is to subject himself to God (Jas 4 7; He 12 9).

EDWARD BAGBY POLLARD

SELF-WILL, self-wil′ (רָצוֹן, rāçōn; αὐθάδης, authádēs): Found once in the OT (Gen 49 6, "In their self-will they hocked an ox") in the death song of Jacob (see HOCK). The idea is found twice in the NT in the sense of "pleasing oneself": "not self-willed, not soon angry" (Tit 1 7); and "daring, self-willed, they tremble not to rail at dignities" (2 Pet 2 10). In all these texts it stands for a false pride, for obstinacy, for "a pertinacious adherence to one's will or wish, esp. in opposition to the dictates of wisdom or propriety or the wishes of others."

HENRY E. DOSKER

SELL, SELLER, sel′ẽr. See TRADE; LYDIA.

SELVEDGE, sel′vej (קָצָה, ḳāçāh): The word occurs only in the description of the tabernacle (Ex 26 4; 36 11). It has reference to the ten curtains which overhung the boards of the sanctuary. Five of these formed one set and five another.

These were "coupled" at the center by 50 loops of blue connected by "clasps" (q.v.) with 50 others on the opposite side. The "selvedge" (self-edge) is the extremity of the curtain in which the loops were.

SEM, sem (Σήμ, Sēm): AV from the Gr form of Shem; thus RV (Lk 3 36).

SEMACHIAH, sem-a-kī'a (סְמַכְיָהוּ, ṣ^emakhyāhū, "Jeh has sustained"): A Korahite family of gatekeepers (1 Ch 26 7). Perhaps the same name should be substituted for "Ismachiah" in 2 Ch 31 13 (see HPN, 291, 295).

SEMEI, sem'ḗ-ī:

(1) (A, Σεμεί, Semeí, B, Σεμεεί, Semeeí): One of those who put away their "strange wives" (1 Esd 9 33) = "Shimei" "of the sons of Hashum" in Ezr 10 33.
(2) AV = RV "Semeias" (Ad Est 11 2).
(3) AV form of RV "Semein" (Lk 3 26).

SEMEIAS, sē-mḗ-ī'as (א A, Σεμείας, Semeías; B, Σεμεείας, Semeeías; AV Semei): An ancestor of Mordecai (Ad Est 11 2) = "Shimei" (Est 2 5).

SEMEIN, sḗ-mē'in (א B, Σεμεείν, Semeeín, A, Σεμεεί, Semeeí, TR, Σεμεΐ, Semeḯ; AV Semei): An ancestor of Jesus in Lk's genealogy (Lk 3 26).

SEMEIS, sem'ḗ-is (A and Fritzsche, Σεμείς, Semeís; B, Σενσεΐς, Senseís; AV Semis): One of the Levites who put away their "strange wives" (1 Esd 9 23) = "Shimei" in Ezr 10 23.

SEMELLIUS, sḗ-mel'i-us: AV = RV SAMELLIUS (q.v.).

SEMIS, sē'mis: AV = RV SEMEIS (q.v.).

LITERATURE

1. Biblical References

The words "Semites," "Semitic," do not occur in the Bible, but are derived from the name of Noah's oldest son, Shem (Gen 5 32; 6 10; 9 18.23 ff; 10 1.21 f; 11 10 f; 1 Ch 1). Formerly the designation was limited to those who are mentioned in Gen 10, 11 as Shem's descendants, most of whom can be traced historically and geographically; but more recently the title has been expanded to apply to others who are not specified in the Bible as Semites, and indeed are plainly called Hamitic, e.g. the Babylonians (Gen 10 10) and the Phoenicians and Canaanites (vs 15–19). The grounds for the inclusion of these Bib. Hamites among the Semites are chiefly linguistic, although political, commercial and religious affinities are also considered. History and the study of comparative philology, however, suggest the inadequacy of a linguistic argument.

2. The Five Sons of Shem

The sons of Shem are given as Elam, Asshur, Arpachshad, Lud and Aram (Gen 10 22). All except the third have been readily identified, Elam as the historic nation in the highlands E. of the Tigris, between Media and Persia; Asshur as the Assyrians; Lud as the Lydians of Asia Minor; and Aram as the Syrians both E. and W. of the Euphrates. The greatest uncertainty is in the identification of Arpachshad, the most prolific ancestor of the Semites, esp. of those of Bib. and more recent importance. From him descended the Hebrews and the Arab tribes, probably also some East African colonies (Gen 10 24–30; 11 12–26). The form of his name (אַרְפַּכְשַׁד, 'arpakhshadh) has given endless trouble to ethnographers. McCurdy divides into two words, Arpach or Arpath, unidentified, and kesedh, the sing. of kasdīm, i.e. the Chaldaeans; Schrader also holds to the Chaldaean interpretation, and the Chaldaeans themselves traced their descent from Arpachshad (Jos, Ant, I, vi, 4); it has been suggested also to interpret as the "border of the Chaldaeans" (BDB; Dillmann, in loc.). But the historic, ordinary and most satisfactory identification is with Arrapachitis, N.E. of Assyria at the headwaters of the Upper Zab in the Armenian highlands (so Ptolemy, classical geographers, Gesenius, Delitzsch). Delitzsch calls attention to the Armenian termination shadh (Comm. on Gen, in loc.).

3. Original Home of the Semites

If we accept, then, this identification of Arpachshad as the most northeasterly of the five Sem families (Gen 10 22), we are still faced by the problem of the primitive home and racial origin of the Semites. Various theories of course have been proposed; fancy and surmise have ranged from Africa to Central Asia. (1) The most common, almost generally accepted, theory places their beginnings in Arabia because of the conservative and primitive Semitic of the Arabic language, the desert characteristics of the various branches of the race, and the historic movements of Sem tribes northward and westward from Arabia. But this theory does not account for some of the most significant facts: e.g. that the Sem developments of Arabia are the last, not the first, in time, as must have been the case if Arabia was the cradle of the race. This theory does not explain the Sem origin of the Elamites, except by denial; much less does it account for the location of Arpachshad still farther north. It is not difficult to understand a racial movement from the mountains of the N.E. into the lowlands of the South and West. But how primitive Arabs could have migrated uphill, as it were, to settle in the Median and Armenian hills is a much more difficult proposition. (2) We must return to the historic and the more natural location of the ancient Sem home on the hillsides and in the fertile valleys of Armenia. Thence the eldest branch migrated in prehistoric times southward to become historic Elam; Lud moved westward into Asia Minor; Asshur found his way down the Tigris to become the sturdy pastoral people of the middle Mesopotamian plateau until the invasion of the Bab colonists and civilization; Aram found a home in Upper Mesopotamia; while Arpachshad, remaining longer in the original home, gave his name to at least a part of it. There in the fertile valleys among the high hills the ancient Semites developed their distinctively tribal life, emphasizing the beauty and close relationship of Nature, the sacredness of the family, the moral obligation, and faith in a personal God of whom they thought as a member of the tribe or friend of the family. The confinement of the mountain valleys is just as adequate an explanation of the Sem traits as the isolation of the oasis. So from the purer life of their highland home, where had been developed the distinctive and virile elements which were to impress the Sem faith on the history of mankind, increasing multitudes of Semites poured over the mountain barriers into the broader levels of the plains. As their own mountain springs and torrents sought a way to the sea down the Tigris and Euphrates beds, so the Sem tribes followed the same natural ways into their future homes: Elam, Babylonia, Assyria, Mesopotamia, Arabia, Pal. Those who settled Arabia sent further migrations into Africa, as well as rebounding into the desert west of the Euphrates, Syria and Pal. Thus Western Asia became the arena of Sem life, whose influences also reached Egypt and, through Phoenicia, the far-away West-Mediterranean.

4. Confusion with Other Races

While we may properly call Western and Southwestern Asia the home of the Sem peoples, there still remains the difficulty of separating them definitely from the other races among whom they lived. The historic Babylonians, e.g., were Sem; yet they dispossessed an earlier non-Sem people, and were themselves frequently invaded by other races, such as the Hittites, and even the Egyptians. It is not certain therefore which gods, customs, laws, etc, of the Babylonians were Sem, and not adopted from those whom they superseded.

Assyria was racially purely Sem, but her laws, customs, literature, and many of her gods were acquired from Babylonia; to such an extent was this true that we are indebted to the library of the Assyr Asshurbanipal for much that we know of Bab religion, literature and history. In Syria also the same mixed conditions prevailed, for through Syria by the fords of the Euphrates lay the highway of the nations, and Hittite and Mitannian at times shared the land with her, and left their influence. Possibly in Arabia Sem blood ran purest, but even in Arabia there were tribes from other races; and the table of the nations in Gen divides that land among the descendants of both Ham and Shem (see TABLE OF NATIONS). Last of all, in Pal, from the very beginning of its historic period, we find an intermingling and confusion of races and religions such as no other Sem center presents. A Hamitic people gave one of its common names to the country—Canaan, while the pagan and late-coming Philistine gave the most used name—Palestine. The archaic remains of Horite, Avite and Hivite are being uncovered by exploration; these races survived in places, no doubt, long after the Sem invasion, contributing their quota to the customs and religious practices of the land. The Hittite also was in the land, holding outposts from his northern empire, even in the extreme south of Pal. If the blue eyes and fair complexions of the Amorites pictured on Egyp monuments are true representations, we may believe that the gigantic Aryans of the North had their portion also in Pal.

5. Reliability of Gen 10

It is customary now in Bib. ethnology to disregard the classification of Gen 10, and to group all the nations of Pal as Sem, esp. the Canaanite and the Phoenician along with the Hebrew. McCurdy in the Standard BD treats the various gods and religious customs of Pal as though they were all Sem, although uniformly these are represented in the OT as perversions and enormities of alien races which the Hebrews were commanded to extirpate. The adoption of them would be, and was, inimical to their own ancestral faith. Because the Hebrews took over eventually the language of the Phoenician, appropriated his art and conveniences, did traffic in his ships, and in Ahab's reign adopted his Baal and Astarte, we are not warranted at all in rushing to the conclusion that the Phoenicians represented a primitive Sem type. Racial identification by linguistic argument is always precarious, as history clearly shows. One might as well say that Latin and the gospel were Saxon. There are indications that the customs and even the early language of the Hebrews were different from those of the people whom they subdued and dispossessed. Such is the consistent tradition of their race, the Bible always emphasizing the irreconcilable difference between their ancestral faith and the practices of the people of Canaan. We may conclude that the reasons for disregarding the classification of Gen with reference to the Semites and neighboring races are not final. Out from that fruitful womb of nations, the Caucasus, the Semites, one branch of the Caucasian peoples, went southwestward—as their cousins the Hamites went earlier toward the South and as their younger relatives, the Aryans, were to go northward and westward—with marked racial traits and a pronounced religious development, to play a leading part in the life of man.

6. Semitic Languages

The phrase Sem Languages is used of a group of languages which have marked features in common, which also set them off from other languages. But we must avoid the unnecessary inference that nations using the same or kindred languages are of the same ancestry. There are other explanations of linguistic affinity than racial, as the Indians of Mexico may speak Spanish, and the Germans of Milwaukee, English. So also neighboring or intermingled nations may just as naturally have used branches of the Sem language stock. However, it is true that the nations which were truly Sem used languages which are strikingly akin. These have been grouped as (1) Eastern Sem, including Bab and Assyr; (2) Northern, including Syriac and Aramaic; (3) Western, including Canaanite, or Phoenician, and Hebrew, and (4) Southern, including Arabic, Sabaean and Ethiopic (cf Geden, Intro to the Heb Bible, 14–28). The distinctive features of this family of languages are (1) the tri-literal root, (2) the consonantal writing, vowel indications being unnecessary so long as the language was spoken, (3) the meager use of moods and tenses in verbal inflection, every action being graphically viewed as belonging to one of two stages in time: completed or incomplete, (4) the paucity of parts of speech, verb and noun covering nearly all the relations of words, (5) the frequent use of internal change in the inflection of words, e.g. the doubling of a consonant or the change of a vowel, and (6) the use of certain letters, called "serviles," as prefixes or suffixes in inflection; these are parts of pronouns or the worn-down residua of nouns and particles. The manner of writing was not uniform in these languages, Bab and Assyr being ideographic and syllabic, and written from left to right, while Aram., Heb and Arab. were alphabetic and written from right to left. The primitive forms and inflections of the group are best preserved in the Arab. by reason of the conservatism of the desert peoples, and in the Assyr by the sudden destruction of that empire and the burial of the records of that language in a comparatively pure state, to be brought back to light by 19th-cent. exploration. All the characteristics given above are clearly manifest in the Heb of the OT.

7. Semitic Religion

In the study of Sem Religion there are two tendencies toward error: (1) the Western pragmatical and unsympathetic overtaxing of oriental Nature-symbols and vividly imaginative speech. Because the Semite used the figure of the rock (Dt 32 4.18.30) in describing God, or poetically conceived of the storm-cloud as Jeh's chariot (Ps 104 3), we must not be led into believing that his religion was a savage animism, or that Jeh of Israel was only the Zeus of the Greeks. How should an imaginative child of Nature speak of the unseen Spiritual Power, except in the richest analogies of Nature? (2) The second error is the tendency to treat the accretions acquired by contact with other nations as of the essence of Sem religion, e.g. the golden calf following the Egyp bondage, and the sexual abominations of the Can. Baal and Astarte.

The primitive and distinctive beliefs of the Sem peoples lie still in great uncertainty because of the long association with other peoples, whose practices they readily took over, and because of the lack of records of the primitive periods of Sem development, their origin and dispersion among the nations being prehistoric. Our sources of information are the Bab and Assyr tablets and monuments, the Egyp inscriptions, Phoen history, Arabian traditions and inscriptions, and principally the OT Scriptures. We can never know perhaps how much the pure Semitism of Babylonians and Assyrians was diverted and corrupted by the developed civilization which they invaded and appropriated; Egypt was only indirectly affected by Sem life; Sem development in Arabia was the latest in all the group, besides which the monuments and reste of Arabian antiquity which have come down to us are comparatively few; and the Phoen development was corrupted by the sensuality of the ancient Canaanitish cults, while the Bible of the Hebrews emphatically differentiated from the unwholesome religions of Pal their own faith, which was ancestral, revealed and pure. Was that Bible faith the primitive Sem cult? At least we must take the Heb tradition at its face value, finding in it the prominent features of an ancestral faith, preserved through one branch of the Sem group. We are met frequently in these Heb records by the claim that the religion they present is not a new development, nor a thing apart from the origin of their race, but rather the preservation of an ancient worship, Abraham, Moses and the prophets appearing not as originators, but reformers, or revivers, who sought to keep their people true to an inherited religion. Its elemental features are the following:

(1) It was pronouncedly theistic; not that other religions do not affirm a god; but the theism of the Semites was such as to give their religion a unique place among all others. To say the least, it had the germ of or the tendency toward monotheism, if we have not sufficient evidence to affirm its monotheism, and to rate the later polytheistic representations of Babylonia and Assyria as local perversions. If the old view that Sem religion was essentially monotheistic be incapable of proof, it is true that the necessary development of their concept of God must ultimately arrive at monotheism. This came to verification in Abram the Hebrew, Jesus the Messiah (Jn 4 21–24) and Mohammed the false prophet. A city-state exclusively, a nation predominantly, worshipped one god, often through some Nature-symbol, as sun or star or element. With the coming of world-conquest, intercourse and vision, the one god of the city or the chief god of the nation became universalized. The ignorant and materialistic Hebrew might localize the God of Israel in a city or on a hilltop; but to the spiritual mind of Amos or in the universal vision of Isaiah He was Jeh, Lord of all the earth.

(2) Closely related to this high conception of Deity was the apparently contradictory but really potent idea of the Deity as a personality. The Semite did not grossly materialize his God as did the savage, nor vainly abstract and etherealize Him and so eliminate Him from the experience of man as did the Greek; but to him God universal was also God personal and intimate. The Hebrew ran the risk of conditioning the spirituality of God in order to maintain His real personality. Possibly this has been the most potent element in Sem religion; God was not far from every one of them. He came into the closest relations as father or friend. He was the companion of king and priest. The affairs of the nation were under His immediate care; He went to war with armies, was a partner in harvest rejoicings; the home was His abode. This conception of Deity carried with it the necessary implication of revelation (Am 3 8). The office, message and power of the Heb prophet were also the logical consequence of knowing God as a Person.

(3) Its peculiar view of Nature was another feature of Sem religion. God was everywhere and always present in Nature; consequently its symbolism was the natural and ready expression of His nature and presence. Simile, parable and Nature-marvels cover the pages and tablets of their records. Unfortunately this poetic conception of Nature quickly enough afforded a ready path in which wayward feet and carnal minds might travel toward Nature-worship with all of its formalism and its degrading excesses. This feature of Sem religion offers an interesting commentary on their philosophy. With them the doctrine of Second Causes received no emphasis; God worked directly in Nature, which became to them therefore the continuous arena of signs and marvels. The thunder was His voice, the sunshine reflected the light of His countenance, the winds were His messengers. And so through this imaginative view of the world the Semite dwelt in an enchanted realm of the miraculous.

(4) The Semite believed in a God who is a moral being. Such a faith in the nature of it was certain to influence profoundly their own moral development, making for them a racial character which has been distinctive and persistent through the changes of millenniums. By it also they have impressed other nations and religions, with which they have had contact. The CH is an expression of the moral issues of theism. The Law and the Prophets of Israel arose out of the conviction of God's righteousness and of the moral order of His universe (Ex 19 5.6; Isa 1 16–20). The Decalogue is a confession of faith in the unseen God; the Law of Holiness (Lev 17–26) is equally a moral code.

While these elements are not absent altogether from other ancient religions, they are pronouncedly characteristic of the Sem to the extent that they have given to it its permanent form, its large development, and its primacy among the religions of the human race. To know God, to hear His eternal tread in Nature, to clothe Him with light as with a garment, to establish His throne in righteousness, to perceive that holiness is the all-pervading atmosphere of His presence—such convictions were bound to affect the life and progress of a race, and to consecrate them as a nation of priests for all mankind.

LITERATURE.—For discussion of the details of Sem peoples and religions reference must be made to the particular articles, such as ARPACHSHAD; EBER; ABRAHAM; HAMMURABI; ASSYRIA; BABYLONIA; BAAL; ASHTORETH; ASHERIM; MOLOCH; CHEMOSH; CHIUN; ISRAEL, RELIGION OF, etc. The lit. on the subject is vast, interesting and far from conclusive. Few of the Bible Dicts. have arts. on this particular subject; reference should be made to those in the Standard and in the HDB, vol V, both by McCurdy; "Semites" in Catholic Enc skims the surface; arts. in International Enc are good. SENAAH, sḗ-nā′a, sen′ȧ-a (סְנָאָה, ṣ^enā′āh; B, Σαανά, Saaná, Σανανάτ, Sananát, A, Σανανά, Sananá, Σενναά, Sennaá, Ἀσάν, Hasán): The children of Senaah are mentioned as having formed part of the company returning from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 35; Neh 7 38). The numbers vary as given by Ezr (3,630) and Neh (3,930), while 1 Esd 5 23 puts them at 3,330. In the last place the name is Sanaas, AV "Annaas" (B, Σαμά, Samá, A, Σανάας, Sanáas). In Neh 3 3 the name occurs with the def. art., ha-senaah. The people may be identical with the Benjamite clan Hassenuah (1 Ch 9 7). Onom speaks of Magdalsenna, a village about 7 miles N. of Jericho, which may be the place intended; but the site is not known.

SENATE, sen′ȧt, SENATOR, sen′a-tẽr: In Ps 105 22, "teach his senàtors [RV "elders"] wisdom." The Heb is זָקֵן, zāḳēn, "elder" (LXX πρεσβύτεροι, presbúteroi). In Acts 5 21, "called the council together and all the senate of the children of Israel." The Gr γερουσία, gerousía, is here evidently used as a more precise equivalent of the foregoing "council" (συνέδριον, sunédrion), to which it is added by καί, kaí, explicative. Reference is had to the Sanhedrin. See SANHEDRIN. This term gerousia occurs in LXX Ex 3 16, etc, and in 1 Macc 12 6; 2 Macc 1 10; 4 44 of the supreme council of the Jews (see Government). In 1 Macc 8 15; 12 3, βουλευτήριον, bouleutḗrion, is used of the Rom senate, which is said to consist of 320 members meeting daily, consulting always for the people, to the end that they may be well governed. These statements are not quite accurate, since the senate consisted normally of 300 members, and met not daily, but on call of the magistrates. Originally, like the gerousia of the Jews, the representatives of families and clans (gentes), the senators were subsequently the ex-magistrates, supplemented, to complete the tale of members, by representatives of patrician (in time also of plebeian) families selected by the censor. The tenure was ordinarily for life, though it might be terminated for cause by the censor. Although constitutionally the senate was only an advisory body, its advice (senatus consultum, auctoritas) in fact became in time a mandate which few dared to disregard. During the republican period the senate practically ruled Rome; under the empire it tended more and more to become the creature and subservient tool of the emperors. William Arthur Heidel

SENEH, sē′ne (סֶנֶּה, ṣeneh; Σεννά, Senná): This was the name attaching to the southern of the two great cliffs between which ran the gorge of Michmash (1 S 14 4). The name means "acacia," and may have been given to it from the thorn bushes growing upon it. Jos (BJ, V, ii, 1) mentions the "plain of thorns" near Gabathsaul. We may hear an echo of the old name in that of Wâdy Suweinīṭ, "valley of the little thorn tree," the name by which the gorge is known today. The cliff must have stood on the right side of the wâdy; see Bozez. Conder gives an excellent description of the place in Tent Work in Pal, II, 112–14. W. Ewing

SENIR, sē′nir (שְׂנִיר, sᵉnīr; Σανείρ, Saneír): This was the Amorite name of Mt. Hermon, according to Dt 3 9 (AV "Shenir"). But in 1 Ch 5 23; Cant 4 8, we have Senir and Hermon named as distinct mountains. It seems probable, however, that Senir applied to a definite part of the Anti-Lebanon or Hermon range. An inscription of Shalmaneser tells us that Hazael, king of Damascus, fortified Mt. Senir over against Mt. Lebanon. So in Ezk 27 5, Senir, whence the Tyrians got planks of fir trees, is set over against Lebanon, where cedars were obtained. The Arab geographers give the name Jebel Sanīr to the part of the Anti-Lebanon range which lies between Damascus and Homs (Yakut, c 1225 AD, quoted by Guy le Strange in Pal under the Moslems, 79. He also quotes Mas'udi, 943 AD, to the effect that Baalbek is in the district of Senir, 295). W. Ewing

SENNACHERIB, se-nak′ẽr-ib (סַנְחֵרִיב, ṣanḥērībh; Σενναχηρείμ, Sennachēreím, Assyr Sin-akhi-erba, "the moon-god Sin has increased the brothers"): Sennacherib (704–682 BC) ascended the throne of Assyria after the death of his father Sargon. Appreciating the fact that Babylon would be difficult to control, instead of endeavoring to conciliate the people he ignored them. The Babylonians, being indignant, crowned a man of humble origin, Marduk-zâkir-shum by name. He ruled only a month, having been driven out by the irrepressible Merodach-baladan, who again appeared on the scene.

In order to fortify himself against Assyria the latter sent an embassy to Hezekiah, apparently for the purpose of inspiring the W. to rebel against Assyria (2 K 20 12–19).

Sennacherib in his first campaign marched into Babylonia. He found Merodach-baladan intrenched at Kish, about 9 miles from Babylon, and defeated him; after which he entered the gates of Babylon, which had been thrown open to him. He placed a Babylonian, named Bêl-ibni, on the throne.

This campaign was followed by an invasion of the country of the Cassites and Iasubigalleans. In his third campaign he directed his attention to the W., where the people had become restless under the Assyr yoke. Hezekiah had been victorious over the Philis (2 K 18 8). In preparation to withstand a siege, Hezekiah had built a conduit to bring water within the city walls (2 K 20 20). Although strongly opposed by the prophet Isaiah, gifts were sent to Egypt, whence assistance was promised (Isa 30 1–4). Apparently also the Phoenicians and Philis, who had been sore pressed by Assyria, had made provision to resist Assyria. The first move was at Ekron, where the Assyr governor Padi was put into chains and sent to Hezekiah at Jerus.

Sennacherib, in 701, moved against the cities in the W. He ravaged the environs of Tyre, but made no attempt to take the city, as he was without a naval force. After Elulaeus the king of Sidon fled, the city surrendered without a battle, and Ethbaal was appointed king. Numerous cities at once sent presents to the king of Assyria. Ashkelon and other cities were taken. The forces of Egypt were routed at Eltekeh, and Ekron was destroyed. He claims to have conquered 46 strongholds of Hezekiah's territory, but he did not capture Jerus, for concerning the king he said, in his annals, "himself like a bird in a cage in Jerus, his royal city, I penned him." He states, also, how he reduced his territory, and how Hezekiah sent to him 30 talents of gold and 800 talents of silver, besides hostages.

The Bib. account of this invasion is found in 2 K 18 13—19 37; Isa 36, 37. The Assyr account differs considerably from it; but at the same time it corroborates it in many details. One of the striking parallels is the exact amount of gold which Hezekiah sent to the Assyr king (see Expos T, XII, 225,405; XIII, 326).

In the following year Sennacherib returned to Babylonia to put down a rebellion by Bêl-ibni and Merodach-baladan. The former was sent to Assyria, and the latter soon afterward died. Ashur-nâdin-shum, the son of Sennacherib, was then crowned king of Babylon. A campaign into Cilicia and Cappadocia followed.

In 694 Sennacherib attacked the Elamites, who were in league with the Babylonians. In revenge, the Elamites invaded Babylonia and carried off Ashur-nâdin-shum to Elam, and made Nergal-ushêzib king of Babylon. He was later captured and in turn carried off to Assyria. In 691 Sennacherib again directed his attention to the S., and at Khalutê fought with the combined forces. Two years later he took Babylon, and razed it to the ground.

In 681 Sennacherib was murdered by his two sons (2 K 19 37; see Sharezer). Esar-haddon their younger brother, who was at the time conducting a campaign against Ararat, was declared king in his stead. A. T. Clay

SENSES, sen′siz: The tr of αἰσθητήριον, aisthētḗrion (He 5 14, "those who by reason of use have their senses exercised to discern good and evil"). The word means, primarily, the seat of the senses, the region of feeling; in the LXX of Jer 4 19, it represents the Heb ḳīr, "the walls of the heart" (see RV), and is used to denote the internal sense or faculty of perceiving and judging, which in He 5

14 is regarded as becoming perfected by use or exercise (cf Eph 4 12 f; 1 Tim 4 7; 2 Pet 3 18).

In 2 Esd 10 36 we have "Or is my sense deceived, or my soul in a dream?" Lat sensus, here "mind" rather than "sense." W. L. Walker

SENSUAL, sen′sho͝o-al (ψυχικός, psuchikós, "animal," "natural"): Bib. psychology has no Eng. equivalent for this Gr original. Man subject to the lower appetites is σαρκικός, sarkikós, "fleshly"; in the communion of his spirit with God he is πνευματικός, pneumatikós, "spiritual." Between the two is the ψυχή, psuchḗ, "soul," the center of his personal being. This ego or "I" in each man is bound to the spirit, the higher nature; and to the body or lower nature.

The soul (psuchē) as the seat of the senses, desires, affections, appetites, passions, i.e. the lower animal nature common to man with the beasts, was distinguished in the Pythagorean and Platonic philosophy from the higher rational nature (noús, pneúma).

The subjection of the soul to the animal nature is man's debasement, to the spirit indwelt of God is his exaltation. The Eng. equivalent for psuchikos, "psychic," does not express this debasement. In the NT "sensual" indicates man's subjection to self and self-interest, whether animal or intellectual—the selfish man in whom the spirit is degraded into subordination to the debased psuchē, "soul." This debasement may be (1) intellectual, "not wisdom . . . . from above, but . . . . earthly, sensual" (Jas 3 15); (2) carnal (and of course moral), "sensual, having not the Spirit" (Jude ver 19). It ranges all the way from sensuous self-indulgence to gross immorality. In the utter subjection of the spirit to sense it is the utter exclusion of God from the life. Hence "the natural [psuchikos] man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God" (1 Cor 2 14). The term is equivalent to "the mind of the flesh" (Rom 8 7) which "is not subject to the law of God." See Psychology. Dwight M. Pratt

SENT (שָׁלַח, shālaḥ; ἀποστέλλω, apostéllō): "Sent" in the OT is the tr of shālaḥ, "to send" (of presents, messengers, etc, Gen 32 18; 44 3; Jgs 6 14; 1 K 14 6; Est 3 13; Prov 17 11; Jer 49 14; Ezk 3 5; 23 40; Dnl 10 11; Ob ver 1); of shᵉlāḥ, Aram. (Ezr 7 14; Dnl 5 24); of shillūḥīm, "sending" (Ex 18 2); in the NT of apostellō, "to send off" or "away," "to send forth" (Jn 9 7, "the pool of Siloam [which is by interpretation, Sent]"); cf Lk 13 4; Neh 3 15, "the pool of Siloah," RV "Shelah"; Isa 8 6, "the waters of Shiloah that go softly," where LXX has Silōam for Heb shilōaḥ, "a sending," which, rather than "Sent," is the original meaning—a sending forth of waters. See Siloam. "Sent" is also the tr of apóstolos, "one sent forth" (the original of the familiar word "apostle"); in Jn 13 16, "one that is sent" (m "Gr 'an apostle'"); cf He 1 14. W. L. Walker SENTENCE, sen′tens: Eight Heb and three Gr words are thus trᵈ in AV. Sometimes it points to a mystery (Dnl 5 12; 8 23); then again to the contents of the Law (Dt 17 11); then again to the idea of judgment (Ps 17 2) or of a judicial sentence (2 Cor 1 9; Lk 23 24), or of judicial advice (Acts 15 19, ARV "judgment").

SENUAH, sḗ-nū′a, sen′ū-a (סְנוּאָה, ṣᵉnū'āh): In AV "A Benjamite" (Neh 11 9); RV has "Hassenuah," transliterating the def. art. AV is to be preferred (cf 1 Ch 9 7).

SEORIM, sḗ-ō′rim, sḗ-ôr′im (שְׂעֹרִים, sᵉ'ōrīm): The name borne by one of the (post-exilic) priestly courses (1 Ch 24 8).

SEPARATE, sep′a-rāt: The tr of a number of Heb and Gr words, בָּדַל, bādhal (Lev 20 24, etc), and ἀφορίζω, aphorízō (Mt 25 32, etc), being the most common. "To separate" and "to consecrate" were originally not distinguished (e.g. Nu 6 2 m), and probably the majority of the uses of "separate" in EV connote "to set apart for God." But precisely the same term that is used in this sense may also denote the exact opposite (e.g. the use of nāzar in Ezk 14 7 and Zec 7 3). See Holy; Nazirite; Saint.

SEPARATION, sep-a-rā′shun: In the Pent the word niddah specially points to a state of ceremonial uncleanness (Lev 12 2.5; 15 20 ff; Nu 6 4 ff; 12 13; 19 21). For a description of the "water of purification," used for cleansing what was ceremonially unclean (Nu 19), see Heifer, Red; Uncleanness. For "separation" in the sense of nēzer, see Nazirite.

SEPHAR, sē′fär: Only in Gen 10 30 (סְפָרָה, ṣᵉphārāh, "toward Sephar"), as the eastern limit of the territory of the sons of Yoktan (Joktan). From the similarity between the names of most of Yoktan's sons and the names of South Arabian towns or districts, it can hardly be doubted that Sephar is represented by the Arab. Ẓafār. The appropriateness of the site seems to outweigh the discrepancy between Arab. ẓ and Heb ṣ. But two important towns in South Arabia bear this name. The one lies a little to the S. of Ṣan'ā'. According to tradition it was founded by Shammir, one of the Sabaean kings, and for a long time served as the royal seat of the Tubbas. The other Ẓafār stands on the coast in the district of Shiḥr, E. of Ḥaḍramaut. The latter is probably to be accepted as the Bib. site. A. S. Fulton

SEPHARAD, sḗ-fā′rad, sef′a-rad (סְפָרַד, ṣᵉphārādh): Mentioned in Ob ver 20 as the place of captivity of certain "captives of Jerus," but no clear indication is given of locality. Many conjectures have been made. The Tg of Jonathan identifies with Spain; hence the Spanish Jews are called Sephardim. Others (Pusey, etc) have connected it with the "Çparda" of the Behistun Inscription, and some have even identified it with "Sardis." The now generally accepted view is that which connects it with the "Saparda" of the Assyr inscriptions, though whether this is to be located to the E. of Assyria or in Northern Asia Minor is not clear. See Schrader, Cuneiform Inscriptions, II, 145–46; Sayce, HCM, 482–84; arts. in DB, HDB, EB, etc. James Orr

SEPHARVAIM, sef-är-vā′im, sē-fär-vā′im (סְפַרְוַיִם, ṣᵉpharwayim; Σεφφαρουάιμ, Sephpharouáim, Σεπφαρουάιμ, Seppharouáim, Σεπφαρούν, Seppharoún, Σεπφαρουμάιν, Seppharoumáin, Ἐπφαρουάιμ, Eppharouáim, Σεπφαρείμ, Sepphareím, the first two being the forms in MSS A and B respectively, of the passages in K, and the last two in Isa): This city, mentioned in 2 K 17 24; 18 34; 19 13; Isa 36 19; 37 13, is generally identified with the Sip(p)ar of the Assyr-Bab inscriptions (Zimbir in Sumerian), on the Euphrates, about 16 miles S.W. of Bagdad. It was one of the two great seats of the worship of the Bab sun-god Šamaš, and also of the goddesses Ištar and Anunit, and seems to have had two principal districts, Sippar of Šamaš, and Sippar of Anunit, which, if the identification were correct, would account for the dual termination -ayim, in Heb. This site is the modern 'Abu-Habbah, which was first excavated by the late Hormuzd Rassam in 1881, and has furnished an enormous number of inscriptions, some of them of the highest importance.

2. Difficulties of That Identification

Besides the fact that the deities of the two cities, Sippar and Sepharvaim, are not the same, it is to be noted that in 2 K 19 13 the king of Sepharvaim is referred to, and, as far as is known, the Bab Sippar never had a king of its own, nor had Akkad, with which it is in part identified, for at least 1,200 years before Sennacherib. The fact that Babylon and Cuthah head the list of cities mentioned is no indication that Sepharvaim was a Bab town—the composition of the list, indeed, points the other way, for the name comes after Ava and Hamath, implying that it lay in Syria.

3. Another Suggestion

Joseph Halévy therefore suggests (ZA, II, 401 ff) that it should be identified with the Sibraim of Ezk 47 16, between Damascus and Hamath (the dual implying a frontier town), and the same as the Šabara'in of the Bab Chronicle, there referred to as having been captured by Shalmaneser. As, however, Šabara'in may be read Šamara'in, it is more likely to have been the Heb Shōmᵉrōn (Samaria), as pointed out by Fried. Delitzsch.

I. Importance.—The Gr VS of the OT commonly known as the Septuagint holds a unique place among translations. Its importance is many-sided. Its chief value lies in the fact that it is a VS of a Heb text earlier by about a millennium than the earliest dated Heb MS extant (916 AD), a VS, in particular, prior to the formal rabbinical revision of the Heb which took place early in the 2d cent. AD. It supplies the materials for the reconstruction of an older form of the Heb than the MT reproduced in our modern Bibles. It is, moreover, a pioneering work; there was probably no precedent in the world's history for a series of translations from one language into another on so extensive a scale. It was the first attempt to reproduce the Heb Scriptures in another tongue. It is one of the outstanding results of the breaking-down of international barriers by the conquests of Alexander the Great and the dissemination of the Gr language, which were fraught with such vital consequences for the history of religion. The cosmopolitan city which he founded in the Delta witnessed the first attempt to bridge the gulf between Jewish and Gr thought. The Jewish commercial settlers at Alexandria, forced by circumstances to abandon their language, clung tenaciously to their faith; and the tr of the Scriptures into their adopted language, produced to meet their own needs, had the further result of introducing the outside world to a knowledge of their history and religion. Then came the most momentous event in its history, the starting-point of a new life; the tr was taken over from the Jews by the Christian church. It was the Bible of most writers of the NT. Not only are the majority of their express citations from Scripture borrowed from it, but their writings contain numerous reminiscences of its language. Its words are household words to them. It laid for them the foundations of a new religious terminology. It was a potent weapon for missionary work, and, when VSS of the Scriptures into other languages became necessary, it was in most cases the LXX and not the Heb from which they were made. Preëminent among these daughter VSS was the Old Lat which preceded the Vulg. Jerome's VS, for the most part a direct tr from the Heb, was in portions a mere revision of the Old Lat; our Prayer-book VS of the Psalter preserves peculiarities of the LXX, transmitted through the medium of the Old Lat. The LXX was also the Bible of the early Gr Fathers, and helped to mold dogma; it furnished proof-texts to both parties in the Arian controversy. Its language gives it another strong claim to recognition. Uncouth and unclassical as much of it appears, we now know that this is not wholly due to the hampering effects of translation. "Biblical Greek," once considered a distinct species, is now a rather discredited term. The hundreds of contemporary papyrus records (letters, business and legal documents, etc) recently discovered in Egypt illustrate much of the vocabulary and grammar and go to show that many so-called "Hebraisms" were in truth integral parts of the koinē̂, or "common language," i.e. the international form of Gr which, since the time of Alexander, replaced the old dialects, and of which the spoken Gr of today is the lineal descendant. The VS was made for the populace and written in large measure in the language of their everyday life.

II. Name.—The name "Septuagint" is an abbreviation of Interpretatio secundum (or juxta) Septuaginta seniores (or viros), i.e. the Gr tr of the OT of which the first instalment was, according to the Alexandrian legend (see III, below), contributed by 70 (or 72) elders sent from Jerus to Alexandria for the purpose at the request of Ptolemy II. The legend in its oldest form restricts their labors to the Pent, but they were afterward credited with the tr of the whole Bible, and before the 4th cent. it had become customary to apply the title to the whole collection: Aug., De Civ. Dei, xviii.42, "quorum interpretatio ut Septuaginta vocetur iam obtinuit consuetudo" ("whose tr is now by custom called the Septuagint"). The MSS refer to them under the abbreviation οἱ ο′, hoi o′ ("the seventy"), or οἱ οβ′, hoi ob′ ("the seventy-two"). The "Septuagint" and the abbreviated form "LXX" have been the usual designations hitherto, but, as these are based on a now discredited legend, they are coming to be replaced by "the OT in Greek," or "the Alexandrian version" with the abbreviation 𝔊.

III. Traditional Origin.—The traditional account of the tr of the Pent is contained in the so-called letter of Aristeas (edd Gr text, P. Wendland, Teubner series, 1900, and Thackeray in the App. to Swete's Intro to the OT in Gr, 1900, etc; Wendland's sections cited below appear in Swete's Intro, ed 2; ET by Thackeray, Macmillan, 1904, reprinted from JQR, XV, 337, and by H. T. Andrews in Charles's Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the OT, II, 83–122, Oxford, 1913).

1. Letter of Aristeas

The writer professes to be a high official at the court of Ptolemy Philadelphus (285–247 BC), a Greek interested in Jewish antiquities. Addressing his brother Philocrates he describes an embassy to Jerus on which he has recently been sent with another courtier Andreas. According to his narrative, Demetrius of Phalerum, a prominent figure in later Athenian history, who here appears as the royal librarian at Alexandria, convinced the king of the importance of securing for his library a tr of the Jewish Law. The king at the same time, to propitiate the nation from whom he was asking a favor, consented, on the suggestion of Aristeas, to liberate all Jewish slaves in Egypt. Copies follow of the letters which passed between Ptolemy and Eleazar, the high priest at Jerus. Ptolemy requests Eleazar to select and dispatch to Alexandria 72 elders, proficient in the Law, 6 from each tribe, to undertake the tr, the importance of the task requiring the services of a large number to secure an accurate VS. Eleazar complies with the request and the names of the selected translators are appended to his letter.

There follow: (1) a detailed description of votive offerings sent by Ptolemy for the temple; (2) a sketch of Jerus, the temple and its services, and the geography of Pal, doubtless reflecting in part the impressions of an eyewitness and giving a unique picture of the Jewish capital in the Ptolemaic era; (3) an exposition by Eleazar of portions of the Law.

The translators arrive at Alexandria, bringing a copy of the Law written in letters of gold on rolls of skins, and are honorably received by Ptolemy. A seven days' banquet follows, at which the king tests the proficiency of each in turn with hard questions. Three days later Demetrius conducts them across the mole known as the Heptastadion to the island of Pharos, where, with all necessaries provided for their convenience, they complete their task, as by a miracle, in 72 days; we are expressly told that their work was the result of collaboration and comparison. The completed VS was read by Demetrius to the Jewish community, who received it with enthusiasm and begged that a copy might be intrusted to their leaders; a solemn curse was pronounced on any who should venture to add to or subtract from or make any alteration in the tr. The whole VS was then read aloud to the king who expressed his admiration and his surprise that Gr writers had remained in ignorance of its contents; he directed that the books should be preserved with scrupulous care.

2. Evidence of Aristobulus and Philo

To set beside this account we have two pre-Christian allusions in Jewish writings. Aristobulus, addressing a Ptolemy who has been identified as Philometor (182–146 BC), repeats the statement that the Pent was tr^{d} under Philadelphus at the instance of Demetrius Phalereus (Euseb., Praep. Ev., XIII, 12.664*b*); but the genuineness of the passage is doubtful. If it is accepted, it appears that some of the main features of the story were believed at Alexandria within a century of the date assigned by "Aristeas" to the tr. Philo (Vit. Moys, ii.5 ff) repeats the story of the sending of the translators by Eleazar at the request of Philadelphus, adding that in his day the completion of the undertaking was celebrated by an annual festival on the isle of Pharos. It is improbable that an artificial production like the Aristeas letter should have occasioned such an anniversary; Philo's evidence seems therefore to rest in part on an independent tradition. His account in one particular paves the way for later accretions; he hints at the inspiration of the translators and the miraculous agreement of their separate VSS: "They prophesied like men possessed, not one in one way and one in another, but all producing the same words and phrases as though some unseen prompter were at the ears of each." At the end of the 1st cent. AD Jos includes in his Antiquities (XII, ii, 1 ff) large portions of the letter, which he paraphrases, but does not embellish.

3. Later Accretions

Christian writers accepted the story without suspicion and amplified it. A catena of their evidence is given in an Appendix to Wendland's ed. The following are their principal additions to the narrative, all clearly baseless fabrications.

(1) The translators worked independently, in separate cells, and produced identical versions, Ptolemy proposing this test of their trustworthiness. So Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Augustine, the Chronicon Paschale and the Cohortatio ad Graecos (wrongly attributed to Justin); the author of the last work asserts that he had seen the cells and heard the tradition on the spot. (2) A modification of this legend says that the translators worked in pairs in 36 cells. So Epiphanius (d. 403 AD), and later G. Syncellus, Julius Pollux and Zonaras. Epiphanius' account is the most detailed. The translators were locked up in sky-lighted cells in pairs with attendants and shorthand writers; each pair was intrusted with one book, the books were then circulated, and 36 identical VSS of the whole Bible, canonical and apocryphal books, were produced; Ptolemy wrote two letters, one asking for the original Scriptures, the second for translators. (3) This story of the two embassies appears already in the 2d cent. AD, in Justin's Apology, and (4) the extension of the translators' work to the Prophets or the whole Bible recurs in the two Cyrils and in Chrysostom. (5) The miraculous agreement of the translators proved them to be no less inspired than the authors (Irenaeus, etc; cf Philo). (6) As regards date, Clement of Alexandria quotes an alternative tradition referring the VS back to the time of the first Ptolemy (322–285 BC); while Chrysostom brings it down to "a hundred or more years [elsewhere "not many years"] before the coming of Christ." Justin absurdly states that Ptolemy's embassy was sent to King Herod; the Chronicon Paschale calls the high priest of the time Onias Simon, brother of Eleazar.

Jerome was the first to hold these later inventions up to ridicule, contrasting them with the older and more sober narrative. They indicate a growing oral tradition in Jewish circles at Alexandria. The origin of the legend of the miraculous consensus of the 70 translators has been reasonably sought in a passage in Ex 24 LXX to which Epiphanius expressly refers. We there read of 70 elders of Israel, not heard of again, who with Aaron, Nadab and Abihu form a link between Moses and the people. After reciting the Book of the Covenant Moses ascends to the top of the mount; the 70, however, ascend but a little way and are bidden to worship from afar: according to the LXX text "They saw the place where the God of Israel stood . . . . and of the elect of Israel not one perished" (ver 11), i.e. they were privileged to escape the usual effect of a vision of the Deity (Ex 33 20). But the vb. used for "perish" (diaphōnein) was uncommon in this sense; "not one disagreed" would be the obvious meaning; hence apparently the legend of the agreement of the translators, the later intermediaries between Moses and Israel of the Dispersion. When the translations were recited, "no difference was discoverable," says Epiphanius, using the same vb. Cave-dwellings in the island of Pharos probably account for the legend of the cells. A curious phenomenon has recently suggested that there is an element of truth in one item of Epiphanius' obviously incredible narrative, viz. the working of the translators in pairs. The Gr books of Jer and Ezk fall into two nearly equal parts, apparently the work of separate translators (see VIII, 1, [2], below); while in Ex, Lev and Pss orthographical details indicate a similar division of the books for clerical purposes. There was, it seems, a primitive custom of transcribing each book on 2 separate rolls, and in the case of Jer and Ezk the practice goes back to the time of tr (JTS, IV, 245 ff, 398 ff; IX, 88 ff).

4. Criticism of the Aristeas Story

Beside the later extravagances, the story of Aristeas appears comparatively rational. Yet it has long been recognized that much of it is unhistorical, in particular the professed date and nationality of the writer. Its claims to authenticity were demolished by Dr. Hody two centuries ago (De bibliorum textibus originalibus, Oxon., 1705). Clearly the writer is not a Greek, but a Jew, whose aim is to glorify his race and to disseminate information about their sacred books. Yet the story is not wholly to be rejected, though it is difficult to disentangle truth from fiction. On one side his veracity has since Hody's time been established; his court titles, technical terms, epistolary formulae, etc, reappear in Egyp papyri and inscriptions, and all his references to Alexandrian life and customs are probably equally trustworthy (§§ 28, 109 ff, measures to counteract the ill effects upon agriculture of migration from country to town; § 167, treatment of informers [cf § 25]; § 175 reception of foreign embassies [cf § 182]). The import of this discovery has, however, since its announcement by Lombroso (Recherches sur l'économie politique de l'Égypte, Turin, 1870), been somewhat modified by the new-found papyri which show that Aristeas' titles and formulae are those of the later, not the earlier, Ptolemaic age.

5. Date

The letter was used by Jos and probably known to Philo. How much earlier is it? Schürer (HJP, II, iii, 309 f [GJV^{4}, III, 608–16]), relying on (1) the questionable Aristobulus passage, (2) the picture drawn of Pal as if still under Ptolemaic rule, from which it passed to the Seleucids c 200 BC, argued that the work could not be later than that date. But it is hard to believe that a fictitious story (as he regards it to be) could have gained credence within little more than half a century of the period to which it relates, and Wendland rightly rejects so ancient an origin. The following indications suggest a date about 100–80 BC.

(1) Many of Aristeas' formulae, etc (see above), only came into use in the 2d cent. BC (Strack, Rhein. Mus., LV, 168 ff; Thackeray, Aristeas, ET, pp. 3, 12). (2) The later Maccabean age or the end of the 2d cent. BC is suggested by some of the translators' names (Wendland, xxvi), and (3) by the independent position of the high priest. (4) Some of Ptolemy's questions indicate a tottering dynasty (§187, etc). (5) The writer occasionally forgets his rôle and distinguishes between his own time and that of Philadelphus (§§ 28, 182). (6) He appears to borrow his name from a Jewish historian of the 2d cent. BC and to wish to pass off the latter's history as his own (§ 6). (7) He is guilty of historical inaccuracies concerning Demetrius, etc. (8) The prologue to the Gr Ecclus (after 132 BC) ignores and contradicts the Aristeas story, whereas Aristeas possibly used this prologue (Wendland, xxvii; cf Hart, Ecclus in Greek, 1909). (9) The imprecation upon any who should alter the tr (§ 311) points to divergences of text which the writer desired to check; cf § 57, where he seems to insist on the correctness of the LXX text of Ex 25 22, "gold of pure gold," as against the Heb. (10) Allusions to current criticisms of the Pent (§§ 128, 144) presuppose a familiarity with it on the part of non-Jewish readers only explicable if the LXX had long been current. (11) Yet details in the Gr orthography preclude a date much later than 100 BC.

6. Credibility

The probable amount of truth in the story is ably discussed by Swete (Intro, 16–22). The following statements in the letter may be accepted: (1) The tr was produced at Alexandria, as is conclusively proved by Egyp influence on its language. (2) The Pent was tr^d first and, in view of the homogeneity of style, as a whole. (3) The Gr Pent goes back to the first half of the 3d cent. BC; the style is akin to that of the 3d-cent. papyri, and the Gr Gen was used by the Hellenist Demetrius toward the end of the cent. (4) The Heb rolls were brought from Jerus. (5) Possibly Philadelphus, the patron of literature, with his religious impartiality, may have countenanced the work. But the assertion that it owed its inception wholly to him and his librarian is incredible; it is known from other sources that Demetrius Phalereus did not fill the office of librarian under that monarch. The language is that of the people, not a literary style suitable to a work produced under royal patronage. The importation of Palestinian translators is likewise fictitious. Dr. Swete acutely observes that Aristeas, in stating that the tr was read to and welcomed by the Jewish community before being presented to the king, unconsciously reveals its true origin. It was no doubt produced to meet their own needs by the large Jewish colony at Alexandria. A demand that the Law should be read in the synagogues in a tongue "understanded of the people" was the originating impulse.

IV. Evidence of Prologue to Sirach.—The interesting, though in places tantalizingly obscure, prologue to Ecclus throws light on the progress made with the tr of the remaining Scriptures before the end of the 2d cent. BC.

The translator dates his settlement in Egypt, during which he produced his VS of his grandfather's work, as "the 38th year under Euergetes the king." The words have been the subject of controversy, but, with the majority of critics, we may interpret this to mean the 38th year of Euergetes II, reckoning from the beginning (170 BC) of his joint reign with Philometor, i.e. 132 BC. Euergetes I reigned for 25 years only. Others, in view of the superfluous preposition, suppose that the age of the translator is intended, but the cumbrous form of expression is not unparalleled. A recent explanation of the date (Hart, Ecclus in Gr) as the 38th year of Philadelphus which was also the 1st year of Euergetes I (i.e. 247 BC) is more ingenious than convincing.

The prologue implies the existence of a Gr VS of the Law, the Prophets and "the rest of the books." The translator, craving his readers' indulgence for the imperfections of his own work, due to the difficulty of reproducing Heb in Gr, adds that others have experienced the same difficulties: "The Law itself and the prophecies and the rest of the books have no small difference when spoken in their original language." From these words we may understand that at the time of writing (132–100 BC) Alexandrian Jews possessed Gr VSS of a large part (probably not the whole) of "the Prophets," and of some of "the Writings" or Hagiographa. For some internal evidence as to the order in which the several books were tr^d see VIII, below.

V. Transmission of the LXX Text.—The main value of the LXX is its witness to an older Heb text than our own. But before we can reconstruct this Heb text we need to have a pure Gr text before us, and this we are at present far from possessing. The Gr text has had a long and complex history of its own. Used for centuries by both Jews and Christians it underwent corruption and interpolation, and, notwithstanding the multitude of materials for its restoration, the original text has yet to be recovered. We are much more certain of the ipsissima verba of the NT writers than of the original Alexandrian VS of the OT. This does not apply to all portions alike. The Gr Pent, e.g., has survived in a relatively pure form. But everywhere we have to be on our guard against interpolations, sometimes extending to whole paragraphs. Not a verse is without its array of variant readings. An indication of the amount of "mixture" which has taken place is afforded by the numerous "doublets" or alternative renderings of a single Heb word or phrase which appear side by side in the transmitted text.

1. Early Corruption of Text

Textual corruption began early, before the Christian era. We have seen indications of this in the letter of Aristeas (III, 5, [9] above). Traces of corruption appear in Philo (e.g. his comment, in Quis Rer. Div. Her. 56, on Gen 15 15, shows that already in his day tapheís, "buried," had become trapheís, "nurtured," as in all our MSS); doublets already exist. Similarly in the NT the author of He quotes (12 15) a corrupt form of the Gr of Dt 29 18.

2. Official Revision of Hebrew Text c 100 AD

But it was not until the beginning of the 2d cent. AD that the divergence between the Gr and the Palestinian Heb text reached an acute stage. One cause of this was the revision of the Heb text which took place about this time. No actual record of this revision exists, but it is beyond doubt that it originated in the rabbinical school, of which Rabbi Akiba was the chief representative, and which had its center at Jamnia in the years following the destruction of Jerus. The Jewish doctors, their temple in ruins, concentrated their attention on the settlement of the text of the Scriptures which remained to them. This school of eminent critics, precursors of the Massoretes, besides settling outstanding questions concerning the Canon, laid down strict rules for Bib. interpretation, and in all probability established an official text.

3. Adoption of LXX by Christians

But another cause widened still farther the distance between the texts of Jerus and Alexandria. This was the adoption of the LXX by the Christian church. When Christians began to cite the Alexandrian VS in proof of their doctrines, the Jews began to question its accuracy. Hence mutual recriminations which are reflected in the pages of Justin's Dialogue with Trypho. "They dare to assert," says Justin (Dial., 68), "that the interpretation produced by your seventy elders under Ptolemy of Egypt is in some points inaccurate." A crucial instance cited by the Jews was the rendering "virgin" in Isa 7 14, where they claimed with justice that "young woman" would be more accurate. Justin retaliates by charging the Jews with deliberate excision of passages favorable to Christianity.

4. Alternative 2d-Century Greek Versions

That such accusations should be made in those critical years was inevitable, yet there is no evidence of any material interpolations having been introduced by either party. But the Alexandrian VS, in view of the revised text and the new and stricter canons of interpretation, was felt by the Jews to be inadequate, and a group of new translations of Scripture in the 2d cent. AD supplied the demand. We possess considerable fragments of the work of three of these translators, viz. Aquila, Symmachus and Theodotion, besides scanty remnants of further anonymous VSS.

5. Aquila

The earliest of "the three" was Aquila, a proselyte to Judaism, and, like his NT namesake, a native of Pontus. He flourished, according to Epiphanius (whose account of these later translators in his De mens. et pond. is not wholly trustworthy), under Hadrian (117–38 AD) and was related to that emperor; there is no probability in Epiphanius' further statement that Hadrian intrusted to Aquila the superintendence of the building of Aelia Capitolina on the site of Jerus, that there he was converted to Christianity by Christian exiles returning from Pella, but that refusing to abandon astrology he was excommunicated, and in revenge turned Jew and was actuated by a bias against Christianity in his VS of the OT. What is certain is that he was a pupil of the new rabbinical school, in particular of Rabbi Akiba (95–135 AD), and that his VS was an attempt to reproduce exactly the revised official text. The result was an extraordinary production, unparalleled in Gr lit., if it can be classed under that category at all. No jot or tittle of the Heb might be neglected; uniformity in the tr of each Heb word must be preserved and the etymological kinship of different Heb words represented. Such were some of his leading principles. The opening words of his tr (Gen 1 1) may be rendered: "In heading founded God with the heavens and with the earth." "Heading" or "summary" was selected because the Heb word for "beginning" was a derivative of "head." "With" represents an untranslatable word ('ēth) prefixed to the accusative case, but indistinguishable from the preposition "with." The Divine Name (the tetragrammaton) was not tr^{d}, but written in archaic Heb characters. "A slave to the letter," as Origen calls him, his work has aptly been described by a modern writer as "a colossal crib" (Burkitt, JQR, October, 1896, 207 ff). Yet it was a success. In Origen's time it was used by all Jews ignorant of Heb, and continued in use for several centuries; Justinian expressly sanctioned its use in the synagogues (Nov., 146). Its lack of style and violation of the laws of grammar were not due to ignorance of Gr, of which the writer shows, in vocabulary at least, a considerable command. Its importance lay and lies (so far as it is preserved) in its exact reproduction of the rabbinical text of the 2d cent. AD; it may be regarded as the beginning of the scientific study of the Heb Scriptures. Though "a bold attempt to displace the LXX," it cannot be charged with being intentionally antagonistic to Christianity. Of the original work, previously known only from extracts in MSS, some palimpsest fragments were recovered from the Cairo Genizah in 1897 and edited by F. C. Burkitt (Fragments of the Books of Kings, 1897) and by C. Taylor (Sayings of the Jewish Fathers^{2}, 1897; Heb-Gr Cairo Genizah Palimpsests, 1900). The student of Swete's OT will trace Aquila's unmistakable style in the footnotes to the Books of S and K; the older and shorter B text in those books has constantly been supplemented in the A text from Aquila. A longer specimen of his work occurs in the Gr Eccl, which has no claim to be regarded as "Septuagint"; Jerome refers to a second ed of Aquila's VS, and the Gr Eccl is perhaps his first ed of that book, made on the basis of an unrevised Heb text (McNeile, Intro to Eccl, Cambridge, 1904, App. I). The suggested identification of Aquila with Onkelos, author of the Tg of that name, has not been generally accepted.

6. Theodotion

Epiphanius' account of the dates and history of Theodotion and Symmachus is untrustworthy. He seems to have reversed their order, probably misled by the order of the tr^{s} in the columns of the Hexapla (see below). He also apparently confused Aquila and Theodotion in calling the latter a native of Pontus. As regards date, Theodotion, critics are agreed, preceded Symmachus and probably flourished under M. Aurelius (161–80), whereas Symmachus lived under Commodus (180–92); Irenaeus mentions only the VSS of Aquila and Theodotion, and that of Symmachus had in his day either not been produced or at least not widely circulated. According to the more credible account of Irenaeus, Theodotion was an Ephesian and a convert to Judaism. His VS constantly agrees with the LXX and was rather a revision of it, to bring it into accord with the current Heb text, than an independent work. The supplementing of lacunae in the LXX (due partly to the fact that the older VS of some books did not aim at completeness) gave scope for greater originality. These lacunae were greatest in Job and his VS of that book was much longer than the LXX. The text of Job printed in Swete's ed is a patchwork of old and new; the careful reader may detect the Theodotion portions by transliterations and other peculiarities. Long extracts from Theodotion are preserved in cod. Q in Jer. As regards the additional matter contained in LXX, Theodotion was inconsistent; he admitted, e.g., the additions to Dnl (Sus, Bel and the Three), but did not apparently admit the non-canonical books as a whole. The church adopted his Dnl in place of the inadequate LXX VS, which has survived in only one Gr MS; but the date when the change took place is unknown and the early history of the two Gr texts is obscure. Theodotion's renderings have been found in writings before his time (including the NT), and it is reasonably conjectured that even before the 2d cent. AD the LXX text had been discarded and that Theodotion's VS is but a working over of an older alternative VS. Theodotion is free from the barbarisms of Aquila, but is addicted to transliteration, i.e. the reproduction of Heb words in Gr letters. His reasons for this habit are not always clear; ignorance of Heb will not account for all (cf VIII, 1, [5], below).

7. Symmachus and Others

Beside the two VSS produced by, and primarily intended for, Jews was a third, presumably to meet the needs of a Jewish Christian sect who were dissatisfied with the LXX. Symmachus, its author, was, according to the more trustworthy account, an Ebionite, who also wrote a comm. on Mt, a copy of which was given to Origen by Juliana, a lady who received it from its author (Euseb., HE, VI, 17). Epiphanius' description of him as a Samaritan convert to Judaism may be rejected. The date of his work, as above stated, was probably the reign of Commodus (180–92 AD). In one respect the VS resembled Aquila's, in its faithful adherence to the sense of the current Heb text; its style, however, which was flowing and literary, was a revolt against Aquila's monstrosities. It seems to have been a recasting of Aquila's VS, with free use of both LXX and Theodotion. It carried farther a tendency apparent in the LXX to refine away the anthropomorphisms of the OT.

Of three other MSS discovered by Origen (one at Nicopolis in Greece, one at Jericho) and known from their position in the Hexapla as Quinta, Sexta, and Septima, little is known. There is no reason to suppose that they embraced the whole OT. Quinta is characterized by Field as the most elegant of the Gr VSS. F. C. Burkitt has discussed "the so-called Quinta of 4 Kings" in PSBA, June, 1902. The Christian origin of Sexta betrays itself in Hab 3 13 ("Thou wentest forth to save thy people for the sake of [or "by"] Jesus thy anointed One").

8. Origen and the Hexapla

These later VSS play a large part in the history of the text of the LXX. This is due to the labors of the greatest LXX scholar of antiquity, the celebrated Origen of Alexandria, whose active life covers the first half of the 3d cent. Origen frankly recognized, and wished Christians to recognize, the merits of the later VSS, and the divergences between the LXX and the current Heb. He determined to provide the church with the materials for ascertaining the true text and meaning of the OT. With this object he set himself to learn Heb—a feat probably unprecedented among non-Jewish Christians of that time—and to collect the later VSS. The idea of using these VSS to amend the LXX seemed to him an inspiration: "By the gift of God we found a remedy for the divergence in the copies of the OT, namely to use the other editions as a criterion" (Comm. on Mt 15 14). The magnum opus in which he embodied the results of his labors was known as the Hexapla or "six-column" edition. This stupendous work has not survived; a fragment was discovered toward the end of the 19th cent. in the Ambrosian Library at Milan (Swete, Intro, 61 ff) and another among the Cairo Genizah palimpsests (ed C. Taylor, Cambridge, 1900). The material was arranged in six parallel columns containing (1) the current Heb text, (2) the same in Gr letters, (3) the VS of Aquila, (4) that of Symmachus, (5) that of the LXX, (6) that of Theodotion. The text was broken up into short clauses; not more than two words, usually one only, stood in the first column. The order of the columns doubtless represents the degree of conformity to the Heb; Aquila's, as the most faithful, heads the VSS, and Symmachus' is on the whole a revision of Aquila as Theodotion's is of the LXX. But Origen was not content with merely collating the VSS; his aim was to revise the LXX and the 5th column exhibited his revised text. The basis of it was the current Alexandrian text of the 3d cent. AD; this was supplemented or corrected where necessary by the other VSS. Origen, however, deprecated alteration of a text which had received ecclesiastical sanction, without some indication of its extent, and the construction of the 5th column presented difficulties. There were (1) numerous cases of words or paragraphs contained in the LXX but not in the Heb, which could not be wholly rejected, (2) cases of omission from the LXX of words in the Heb, (3) cases of paraphrase and minor divergences, (4) variations in the order of words or chapters. Origen here had recourse to a system of critical signs, invented and employed by the grammarian Aristarchus (3d cent. BC) in his ed of Homer. Passages of the first class were left in the text, but had prefixed to them an obelus, a sign of which the original form was a "spit" or "spear," but figuring in LXX MSS as a horizontal line usually with a dot above and a dot below (÷); other varieties are —̣, —̤, ∽; the sign in Aristarchus indicated censure, in the Hexapla the doubtful authority of the words which followed. The close of the obelized passage was marked by the metobelus, a colon (:), or, in the Syr VSS, a mallet (⋎). Passages missing in the LXX were supplied from one of the other VSS (Aquila or Theodotion), the beginning of the extract being marked by an asterisk (※)—a sign used by Aristarchus to express special approval—the close, by the metobelus. Where LXX and Heb widely diverged, Origen occasionally gave two VSS, that of a later translator under an asterisk, that of LXX obelized. Divergence in order was met by transposition, the Heb order being followed; in Prov, however, the two texts kept their respective order, the discrepancy being indicated by a combination of signs. Minor supposed or real corruptions in the Gr were tacitly corrected. Origen produced a minor edition, the Tetrapla, without the first two columns of the larger work. The Heptapla and Octapla, occasionally mentioned, appear to be alternative names given to the Hexapla at points where the number of columns was increased to receive other fragmentary VSS. This gigantic work, which according to a reasonable estimate must have filled 5,000 leaves, was probably never copied in extenso. The original was preserved for some centuries in the library of Pamphilus at Caesarea; there it was studied by Jerome, and thither came owners of Bib. MSS to collate their copies with it, as we learn from some interesting notes in our uncial MSS (e.g. a 7th-cent. note appended to Est in cod. S). The Library probably perished c 638 AD, when Caesarea fell into the hands of the Saracens.

9. Hexaplaric MSS

But, though the whole work was too vast to be copied, it was a simple task to copy the 5th column. This task was performed, partly in prison, by Pamphilus, a martyr in the Diocletian persecution, and his friend Eusebius, the great bishop of Caesarea. Copies of the "Hexaplaric" LXX, i.e. Origen's doctored text with the critical signs and perhaps occasional notes, were, through the initiative of these two, widely circulated in Pal in the 4th cent. Naturally, however, the signs became unintelligible in a text detached from the parallel columns which explained them; scribes neglected them, and copies of the doctored text, lacking the precautionary symbols, were multiplied. This carelessness has wrought great confusion; Origen is, through others' fault, indirectly responsible for the production of MSS in which the current LXX text and the later VSS are hopelessly mixed. No MSS give the Hexaplaric text as a whole, and it is preserved in a relatively pure form in very few: the uncials G and M (Pent and some historical books), the cursives 86 and 88 (Prophets). Other so-called Hexaplaric MSS, notably cod. Q (Marchalianus: Proph.) preserve fragments of the 5th and of the other columns of the Hexapla. (For the Syro-Hexaplar see below, VI, 1.) Yet, even did we possess the 5th column entire, with the complete apparatus of signs, we should not have "the original LXX," but merely, after removing the asterisked passages, a text current in the 3d cent. The fact has to be emphasized that Origen's gigantic work was framed on erroneous principles. He assumed (1) the purity of the current Heb text, (2) the corruption of the current LXX text where it deviated from the Heb. The modern critic recognizes that the LXX on the whole presents the older text, the divergences of which from the Heb are largely attributable to an official revision of the latter early in the Christian era. He recognizes also that in some books (e.g. Job) the old Gr VS was only a partial one. To reconstruct the original text he must therefore have recourse to other auxiliaries beside Origen.

10. Recensions Known to Jerome

Such assistance is partly furnished by two other recensions made in the century after Origen. Jerome (Praef. in Paralipp.; cf Adv. Ruf., ii.27) states that in the 4th cent. three recensions circulated in different parts of the Christian world: "Alexandria and Egypt in their Septuagint acclaim Hesychius as their authority, the region from Constantinople to Antioch approves the copies of Lucian the martyr, the intermediate Palestinian provinces read the MSS which were promulgated by Eusebius and Pamphilus on the basis of Origen's labors, and the whole world is divided between these three varieties of text."

11. Hesychian Recension

Hesychius is probably to be identified with the martyr bishop mentioned by Eusebius (HE, VIII, 13) along with another scholar martyr, Phileas bishop of Thmuis, and it is thought that these two were engaged in prison in revising the Egyp text at the time when Pamphilus and Eusebius were employed on a similar task under similar conditions. How far existing MSS preserve the Hesychian recension is uncertain; agreement of their text with that of Egyp VSS and Fathers (Cyril in particular) is the criterion. For the Prophets Ceriani has identified cod. Q and its kin as Hesychian. For the Octateuch N. McLean (JTS, II, 306) finds the Hesychian text in a group of cursives, 44, 74, 76, 84, 106, 134, etc. But the first instalments of the larger Cambridge LXX raise the question whether cod. B (Vaticanus) may not itself be Hesychian; its text is more closely allied to that of Cyril Alex. than to any other patristic text, and the consensus of these two witnesses against the rest is sometimes (Ex 32 14) curiously striking. In the Psalter also Rahlfs (Septuaginta-Studien, 2. Heft, 1907, 235) traces the Hesychian text in B and partially in S (Sinait.). Cf von Soden's theory for the NT and see TEXT AND MSS OF THE NT.

12. Lucianic Recension

The Lucianic recension was the work of another martyr, Lucian of Antioch (d. 311–12), probably with the collaboration of the Hebraist Dorotheus. There are, as Hort has shown, reasons for associating Lucian with a "Syrian" revision of the NT in the 4th cent., which became the dominant type of text. That he produced a Syrian recension of the Gr OT is expressly stated by Jerome, and we are moreover able with considerable certainty to identify the extant MSS which exhibit it. The identification, due to Field and Lagarde, rests on these grounds: (1) certain verses in 2 K are in the Arab. Syro-Hexaplar marked with the letter L, and a note explains that the letter indicates Lucianic readings; (2) the readings so marked occur in the cursives 19, 82, 93, 108, 118; (3) these MSS in the historical books agree with the LXX citations of the Antiochene Fathers Chrysostom and Theodoret. This clue enabled Lagarde to construct a Lucianic text of the historical books (Librorum Vet. Test. canonic. pars prior, Göttingen, 1883); his death prevented the completion of the work. Lagarde's edition is vitiated by the fact that he does not quote the readings of the individual MSS composing the group, and it can be regarded only as an approximate reconstruction of "Lucian." It is evident, however, that the Lucianic LXX possessed much the same qualities as the Syrian revision of the NT; lucidity and completeness were the main objects. It is a "full" text, the outcome of a desire to include, so far as possible, all recorded matter; "doublets" are consequently numerous. While this "conflation" of texts detracts from its value, the Lucianic revision gains importance from the fact that the sources from which it gleaned include an element of great antiquity which needs to be disengaged; where it unites with the Old Lat VS against all other authorities its evidence is invaluable.

VI. Reconstruction of LXX Text; Versions, Manuscripts and Printed Editions.—The task of restoring the original text is beset with difficulties. The materials (MSS, VSS, patristic citations) are abundant, but none has escaped "mixture," and the principles for reconstruction are not yet securely established (Swete, Intro, I, iv–vi; III, vi).

1. Ancient Versions Made from the LXX

Among the chief aids to restoration are the daughter VSS made from the LXX, and above all the Old Lat (pre-Hieronymian) VS, for the earliest (African) Old Lat VS dates from the 2d cent. AD, i.e. before Origen, and contains a text from which the asterisked passages in Hexaplaric MSS are absent; it thus "brings us the best independent proof we have that the Hexaplar signs introduced by Origen can be relied on for the reconstruction of the LXX" (Burkitt). The Old Lat also enables us to recognize the ancient element in the Lucianic recension. But the Lat evidence itself is by no means unanimous. Augustine (De Doctr. Christ., ii.16) speaks of the infinite variety of Lat VSS, though they may ultimately prove all to fall into two main families, African and European. Peter Sabatier's collection of patristic quotations from the Old Lat is still useful, though needing verification by recent editions of the Fathers. Of Old Lat MSS one of the most important is the cod. Lugdunensis, edited by U. Robert (Pentateuchi e cod. Lugd. versio Lat. antiquissima, Paris, 1881; Heptateuchi partis post. versio Lat. antiq. e cod. Lugd., Lyons, 1900). The student should consult also Burkitt's ed of The Rules of Tyconius ("Texts and Studies," III, 1, Cambridge, 1894) and The Old Latin and the Itala (ib, IV, 3, 1896).

Jerome's Vulgate is mainly a direct tr from the Heb, but the Vulg Psalter, the so-called Gallican, is one of Jerome's two revisions of the Old Lat, not his later VS from the Heb, and some details in our Prayer-book Psalter are ultimately derived through the Vulg Psalter from the LXX. Parts of the Apoc (Wisd, Ecclus, Bar, 1 and 2 Macc) are also pure Old Lat, untouched by Jerome.

The early date (2d cent. AD) once claimed for the Egyp or Coptic VSS (Bohairic, i.e. in the dialect of Lower Egypt, Sahidic or Upper Egyp, and Middle Egyp) has not been confirmed by later researches, at least as regards the first-named, which is probably not earlier than the 3d or 4th cent. AD. Rahlfs (Sept.-Studien, II, 1907) identifies the Bohairic Psalter as the Hesychian recension. The Sahidic VS of Job has fortunately preserved the shorter text lacking the later insertions from Theodotion (Lagarde, Mittheilungen, 1884, 204); this does not conclusively prove that it is pre-Origenic; it may be merely a Hexaplaric text with the asterisked passages omitted (Burkitt, EB, IV, 5027). The influence of the Hexapla is traceable elsewhere in this VS.

The Ethiopic VS was made in the main from the Gr and in part at least from an early text; Rahlfs (Sept Stud., I, 1904) considers its text of S-K, with that of cod. B, to be pre-Origenic.

The Vulg or Peshiṭta Syriac VS was made from the Heb, though partly influenced by the LXX. But another Syr VS is of primary importance for the LXX text, viz. that of Paul, bishop of Tella (Constantine in Mesopotamia), executed at Alexandria in 616–17 and known as the Syro-Hexaplar. This is a bald Syr VS of the LXX column of the Hexapla, containing the Hexaplar signs. A MS of the poetical and prophetical books is in the Ambrosian Library at Milan and has been edited by Ceriani (Monumenta sacra et profana, 1874); fragments of the historical books are also extant (Lagarde and Rahlfs, Bibliothecae Syriacae, Göttingen, 1892). This VS supplements the Gr Hexaplaric MSS and is the principal authority for Origen's text. For the original VS of Dnl, which has survived in only one late MS, the Syro-Hexaplar supplies a second and older authority of great value.

The Armenian VS (ascribed to the 5th cent.) also owes its value to its extreme literalness; its text of the Octateuch is largely Hexaplaric.

A bare mention must suffice of the Arabic VS (of which the prophetical and poetical books, Job excluded, were rendered from the LXX); the fragments of the Gothic VS (made from the Lucianic recension), and the Slavonic (partly from LXX, also Lucianic) and the Georgian VSS.

2. Manuscripts

For a full description of the Gr MSS see Swete, Intro, I, ch v. They are divided according to their script (capitals or minuscules) into uncials and cursives, the former ranging from the 4th cent. (four papyrus scraps go back to the 3d cent.; Nestle in PRE, XXIII, 208) to the 10th cent. AD, the latter from the 9th to the 16th cent. AD. Complete Bibles are few; the majority contain groups of books only, such as the Pent, Octateuch (Gen-Ruth), the later historical books, the Psalter, the 3 or 5 "Solomonic" books, the Prophets (major, minor or both). Uncials are commonly denoted by capital letters (in the ed of Holmes and Parsons by Roman figures); cursives, of which over 300 are known, by Arabic figures; in the larger Cambridge LXX the selected cursives are denoted by small Roman letters.

The following are the chief uncials containing, or which once contained, the whole Bible: B (Vaticanus, at Rome, 4th cent. AD), adopted as the standard text in all recent edd; S or ℵ (Sinaiticus, at St. Petersburg and Leipzig, 4th cent. AD), discovered by Tischendorf in 1844 and subsequent years in St. Catherine's Convent, Mt. Sinai; A (Alexandrinus, British Museum, probably 5th cent. AD); C (Ephraemi rescriptus, Paris, probably 5th cent.), a palimpsest, the older Bib. matter underlying a mediaeval Gr text of works of Ephrem the Syrian. For the Octateuch and historical books: D (Cottonianus, Brit. Mus., probably 5th or 6th cent.), fragments of an illuminated Gen, the bulk of which perished in a fire at Ashburnham House in 1731, but earlier collations of Grabe and others are extant, which for the lost portions are cited in the Cambridge texts as D (Dsil, i.e. silet Grabius, denotes an inference from Grabe's silence that the MS did not contain a variant); F (Ambrosianus, Milan, 4th to 5th cent.), fragments of the Octateuch; G (Sarravianus, fragments at Leyden, Paris and St. Petersburg, 4th to 5th cent.), important as containing an Origenic text with the Hexaplar signs; L (Purpureus Vindobonensis, Vienna, 5th to 6th cent.), fragments of an illuminated MS Genesis on purple vellum; M (Coislinianus, Paris, 7th cent.), important on account of its marginal Hexaplaric matter. For the Prophets, Q (Marchalianus, Rome, 6th cent.) is valuable, both for its text, which is "Hesychian" (see above), and for its abundant marginal Hexaplaric matter. A curious mixture of uncial and cursive writing occurs in E (Bodleianus, probably 10th cent.), fragments of the historical books (to 3 R 16 28) preserved at Oxford, Cambridge (1 leaf), St. Petersburg and London; Tischendorf, who brought the MS from the East, retained the tell-tale Cambridge leaf, on which the transition from uncial to cursive script occurs, until his death. The long-concealed fact that the scattered fragments were part of a single MS came to light through Swete's identification of the Cambridge leaf as a continuation of the Bodleian fragment. Many of the cursives still await investigation, as do also the lectionaries. The latter, though the MSS are mainly late, should repay study. The use of the LXX for lectionary purposes was inherited by the church from the synagogue, and the course of lessons may partly represent an old system; light may also be expected from them on the local distribution of various types of text.

3. Printed Texts

Of the printed text the first four editions were (1) the Complutensian Polyglot of Cardinal Ximenes, 1514–17, comprising the Gr, Heb and Vulg texts, the last in the middle place of honor being compared to Jesus in the midst between the two thieves (!). The Gr was based on MSS from the Vatican and one from Venice; it exhibits on the whole the Lucianic recension, as the Hesychian is by a curious coincidence represented in (2) the Aldine ed of 1518, based on Venetian MSS. (3) The monumental Sixtine ed, published at Rome in 1586 under the auspices of Pope Sixtus V and frequently reprinted, was mainly based on the cod. Vaticanus, the superiority of which text is justly recognized in the interesting preface (printed in Swete's Intro). (4) The Eng. ed (Oxford, 1707–20) begun by Grabe (d. 1712) was based on the cod. Alexandrinus, with aid from other MSS, and had the peculiarity that he employed Origen's critical signs and different sizes of type to show the divergence between the Gr and the Heb. Of more recent edd three are preëminent. (5) The great Oxford ed of Holmes and Parsons (Oxford, 1798–1827, 5 vols, folio) was the first attempt to bring together in a gigantic apparatus criticus all the evidence of uncial and cursive MSS (upward of 300), VSS and early citations from Philo and Jos onward. As a monumental storehouse of materials "H. and P." will not be wholly superseded by the latest ed now (1913) in preparation. (6) The serviceable Cambridge "manual," ed of Swete (1st ed 1887–94, ed 3, 1901–7, 3 vols, 8vo), is in the hands of all serious LXX students. The text is that of B, or (where B fails) of A, and the apparatus contains the readings of the principal uncial MSS. New materials discovered since the ed of H. and P., esp. cod. S, are employed, and greater accuracy in the presentation of the other evidence has been made possible by photography. The fact that the text here printed is but a provisional one is sometimes overlooked. Swete's ed was designed as a precursor to (7) the larger Cambridge LXX, of which three instalments embracing the Pent have (1913) appeared (The OT in Gr, ed A. E. Brooke and N. McLean, Cambridge, 1911 pt. III, Nu and Dt). The text is a reprint of Swete's except that from Ex onward a few alterations of errors in the primary MS have been corrected, a delicate task in which the editors have rejected a few old readings without sufficient regard to the peculiarities of Hellenistic Gr. The importance of the work lies in its apparatus, which presents the readings of all the uncials, VSS and early citations, and those of a careful representative selection of the cursives. The materials of H and P are brought up to date and presented in a more reliable and convenient form. Besides these there is (8) Lagarde's reconstruction of the Lucianic recension of the historical books, which, as stated, must be used with caution (see above).

4. Reconstruction of Original Text

The task of reconstructing the oldest text is still unaccomplished. Materials have accumulated, and much preliminary "spade-work" has been done, by Lagarde in particular (see his "axioms" in Swete, Intro, 484 ff) and more recently by Nestle and Rahlfs; but the principles which the editor must follow are not yet finally determined. The extent to which "mixture" has affected the documents is the stumbling-block. Clearly no single MS presents the oldest text. That of cod. B, as in the NT, is on the whole the purest. In the 4 books of "Reigns" (1 S–2 K), e.g., it has escaped the grosser interpolations found in most MSS, and Rahlfs (Sept.-Studien, I, 1904) regards its text as pre-Origenic. It is, however, of unequal value and by no means an infallible guide; in Jgs, e.g., its text is undoubtedly late, no earlier than the 4th cent. AD, according to one authority (Moore, "Jgs," ICC). In relation to two of the 4th-cent. recensions its text is neutral, neither predominantly Lucianic nor Hexaplaric; but it has been regarded by some authorities as Hesychian. Possibly the recension made in the country which produced the LXX adhered more closely than others to the primitive text; some "Hesychian" features in the B text may prove to be original. Still even its purest portions contain marks of editorial revision and patent corruptions. Cod. A presents a quite different type of text, approximating to that of the MT. In the books of "Reigns" it is practically a Hexaplaric text without the critical signs, the additional matter being mainly derived from Aquila. Yet that it contains an ancient element is shown by the large support given to its readings by the NT and early Christian writers. Individual MSS must give place to groups. In order to reconstruct the texts current before Origen's time, it is necessary to isolate the groups containing the three 4th-cent. recensions, and to eliminate from the recensions thus recovered all Hexaplaric matter and such changes as appear to have been introduced by the authors of those recensions. Other groups brought to light by the larger Cambridge text have also to be taken into account. The attempt to penetrate into the earlier stages of the history is the hardest task. The Old Lat VS is here the surest guide; it has preserved readings which have disappeared from all Gr MSS, and affords a criterion as to the relative antiquity of the Gr variants. The evidence of early Christian and Jewish citations is also valuable. Ultimately, after elimination of all readings proved to be "recensional" or late, the decision between outstanding variants must depend on internal evidence. These variants will fall into two classes: (1) those merely affecting the Gr text, by far the larger number and presenting less difficulty; (2) those which imply a different Heb text. In adjudicating on the latter Lagarde's main axioms have to be borne in mind, that a free tr is to be preferred to a slavishly literal one, and a tr presupposing another Heb original to one based on the MT.

1. Contents

VII. Number, Titles and Order of Books.—In addition to the Heb canonical books, the LXX includes all the books in the Eng. Apoc except 2 Esd (Pr Man only finds a place among the canticles appended in some MSS to the Ps) besides a 3d and 4th book of Macc. Swete further includes in his text as an appendix of Gr books on the borderland of canonicity the Ps of Sol (found in some cursives and mentioned in the list in cod. A), the Gr fragments of the Book of En and the ecclesiastical canticles above mentioned. Early Christian writers in quoting freely from these additional books as Scripture doubtless perpetuate a tradition inherited from the Jews of Alexandria. Most of the books being original

Gr compositions were ipso facto excluded from a place in the Heb Canon. Greater latitude as regards canonicity prevailed at Alexandria; the Pent occupied a place apart, but as regards later books no very sharp line of demarcation between "canonical" and "uncanonical" appears to have been drawn.

2. Titles

Palestinian Jews employed the first word or words of each book of the Pent to serve as its title; Gen e.g. was denoted "in the beginning," Ex "[And these are the] names"; a few of the later books have similar titles. It is to the LXX, through the medium of the Lat VSS, that we owe the familiar descriptive titles, mostly suggested by phrases in the Gr VS. In some books there are traces of rival titles in the Ptolemaic age. Exodus ("outgoing") is also called Exagōgḗ ("leading out") by Philo and by the Hellenist Ezekiel who gave that name to his drama on the deliverance from Egypt. Philo has also alternative names for Dt—Epinomís ("after-law") borrowed from the title of a pseudo-Platonic treatise, and for Jgs "the Book of Judgments." The last title resembles the Alexandrian name for the books of S and K, viz. the four Books of Kingdoms or rather Reigns; the name may have been given in the first place to a partial VS including only the reigns of the first few monarchs. Jerome's influence in this case restored the old Heb names as also in Ch (=Heb "Words of Days," "Diaries"), which in LXX is entitled Paraleipomena, "omissions," as being a supplement to the Books of Reigns.

3. Bipartition of Books

Another innovation, due apparently to the Gr translators or later editors, was the breaking up of some of the long historical narratives into volumes of more manageable compass. In the Heb MSS, S, K, Ch, Ezr-Neh form respectively one book apiece. In the LXX the first three of these collections are subdivided into two volumes as in modern Bibles; an acquaintance with the other arrangement is, however, indicated in cod. B by the insertion at the end of 1 R, 3 R, 1 Ch of the first sentence of the succeeding book, a reminder to the reader that a continuation is to follow. Ezr-Neh, the Gr VS (2 Esd) being made under the influence of Palestinian tradition, remains undivided. Originally Ch-Ezr-Neh formed a unit, as was apparently still the case when the oldest Gr VS (1 Esd) was made.

4. Grouping and Order of Books

In the arrangement of books there is a radical departure from Palestinian practice. There were three main unalterable divisions in the Heb Bible, representing three stages in the formation of the Canon: Law, Prophets ("Former," i.e. Josh, Jgs, S, K, and "Latter") and "Writings." This arrangement was known at Alexandria at the end of the 2d cent. BC (Sir, prol.) but was not followed. The "Writings" were a miscellaneous collection of history and poetry with one prophetical book (Dnl). Alexandrian scholars introduced a more literary and symmetrical system, bringing together the books of each class and arranging them with some regard to the supposed chronological order of their authors. The Law, long before the Gr tr, had secured a position of supreme sanctity; this group was left undisturbed, it kept its precedence and the individual books their order (Lev and Nu, however, exchange places in a few lists). The other two groups are broken up. Ruth is removed from the "Writings" and attached to Jgs. Ch and Ezr-Neh are similarly transferred to the end of the historical group. This group, from chronological considerations, is followed by the poetical and other "Writings," the Prophets coming last (so in B, etc; in SA prophets precede poets). The internal order of the Gr Hagiographa, which includes quasi-historical (Est, Tob, Jth) and Wisdom books, is variable. Dnl now first finds a place among the Prophets. The 12 minor prophets usually precede the major (S and Western authorities give the Four precedence), and the order of the first half of their company is shuffled, apparently on chronological grounds, Hos being followed by Am, Mic, Joel, Ob, Jon. Jer has his train of satellites, Bar, Lam (transferred from the "Writings") and Ep. Jer; Sus and Bel consort with and form integral parts of Dnl. Variation in the order of books is partly attributable to the practice of writing each book on a separate papyrus roll, kept in a cylindrical case; rolls containing kindred matter would tend to be placed in the same case, but there would be no fixed order for these separate items until the copying of large groups in book-form came into vogue (Swete, Intro, 225 f, 229 f).

VIII. Characteristics of the Version and Its Component Parts.—Notwithstanding the uncertain state of the text, some general characteristics of the VS are patent. It is clear that, like the Heb itself, it is not a single book, but a library. It is a series of VSS and Gr compositions covering well-nigh 400 years, since it includes a few productions of the 2d cent. AD; the bulk of the tr^{s}, however, fall within the first half of the period (Sir, prol.).

1. Grouping of LXX Books on Internal Evidence

The tr^{s} may be grouped and their chronological order approximately determined from certain characteristics of their style. (1) We may inquire how a Heb word or phrase is rendered in different parts of the work. Diversity of renderings is not an infallible proof that different hands have been employed, since invariable uniformity in tr is difficult of attainment and indeed was not the aim of the Pent translators, who seem rather to have studied variety of expression. If, however, a Heb word is consistently rendered by one Gr word in one portion and by another elsewhere, and if each of the two portions has other features peculiar to itself, it becomes highly probable that the two portions are the work of different schools. Among "test-words" which yield results of this kind are "servant" in "Moses the servant of the Lord," "Hosts" in "Lord of Hosts," "Philistines" (Swete, Intro, 317 f; Thackeray, Grammar of the OT, 7 ff). (2) We may compare the Gr with that of dated documents of the Ptolemaic age. The tr^{s} were written in the koinḗ or "common" Gr, most of them in the vernacular variety of it, during a period when this new cosmopolitan language was in the making; the abundant dated papyri enable us to trace some stages in its evolution. The Petrie and Hibeh papyri of the 3d cent. BC afford the closest parallels to the Gr Pent. The following century witnessed a considerable development or "degeneracy" in the language, of which traces may be found in the Gr of the prophetical books. Beside the vernacular Gr was the literary language of the "Atticistic" school which persistently struggled, with indifferent success, to recover the literary flavor of the old Gr masterpieces. This style is represented in the LXX by most of the original Gr writings and by the paraphrases of some of the "Writings." (3) We may compare the Gr books as translations, noting in which books license is allowed and which adhere strictly to the Heb. The general movement is in the direction of greater literalism; the later books show an increasing reverence for the letter of Scripture, resulting in the production of pedantically literal VSS; the tendency culminated in the 2d cent. AD in the barbarisms of Aquila. Some of the "Writings" were freely handled, because they had not yet obtained canonical rank at the time of tr. Investigation on these lines goes to show that the order of the tr was approximately that of the Heb Canon. The Gr Hexateuch may be placed in the 3d cent. BC, the Prophets mainly in the 2d cent. BC, the "Writings" mainly in the 2d and 1st cents. BC.

(1) The Hexateuch.—The Gr Pent should undoubtedly be regarded as a unit: the Aristeas story may so far be credited. It is distinguished by a uniformly high level of the "common" vernacular style, combined with faithfulness to the Heb, rarely lapsing into literalism. It set the standard which later translators tried to imitate. The text was more securely established in this portion and substantial variant readings are comparatively few. The latter part of Ex is an exception; the Heb had here not reached its final form in the 3d cent. BC, and there is some reason for thinking that the VS is not the work of the translator of the first half. In Dt a few new features in vocabulary appear (e.g. ekklēsía; see Hort, Christian Ecclesia, 4 ff). The Gr VS of Jos forms a link between the Pent and the later historical books. The text was not yet fixed, and variants are more abundant than in the Pent. The earliest VS, probably of selections only, appears from certain common features to have been nearly coeval with that of the Law.

(2) The "Latter" Prophets.—There is little doubt that the next books to be tr^{d} were the Prophets in the narrower sense, and that Isa came first. The style of the Gr Isa has a close similarity, not wholly attributable to imitation, to that of the Pent: a certain freedom of treatment connects it with the earlier tr period: it was known to the author of Wisd (Isa 3 10 with Ottley's n.). The tr shows "obvious signs of incompetence" (Swete), but the task was an exacting one. The local Egyp coloring in the tr is interesting (R. R. Ottley, Book of Isa according to the LXX, 2 vols, Gr text of A, tr and notes, Cambridge, 1904–6, with review in JTS, X, 299). Jer, Ezk and the Minor Prophets were probably tr^{d} en bloc or nearly so. The Palestinian Canon had now been enlarged by a second group of Scriptures and this stimulated a desire among Alexandrian Jews to possess the entire collection of the Prophets in Gr. The undertaking seems to have been a formal and quasi-official one, not a haphazard growth. For it has been ascertained that Jer and Ezk were divided for tr purposes into two nearly equal parts; a change in the Gr style occurs at the junctures. In Jer the break occurs in ch 29 (LXX order); the clearest criterion of the two styles is the twofold rendering of "Thus saith the Lord." The last ch (52) is probably a later addition in the Gr. The translator of the second half of Jer also tr^{d} the first half of Bar (1 1—3 8); he was incompetent and his work, if our text may be relied on, affords flagrant examples of Gr words being selected to render Heb words which he did not understand merely because of their similar sound. Ezk is similarly divided, but here the translator of the first half (chs 1–27) undertook the difficult last quarter as well (chs 40–48), the remainder being left to a second worker. An outstanding test is afforded by the renderings of the refrain, "They shall know that I am the Lord." The Gr VS of "the twelve" shows no trace of a similar division; in its style it is closely akin to the first half of Ezk and is perhaps by the same hand (JTS, IV, 245, 398, 578). But this official VS of the Prophets had probably been preceded by VSS of short passages selected to be read on the festivals in the synagogues. Lectionary requirements occasioned the earliest VSS of the Prophets, possibly of the Pent as well. Two indications of this have been traced. There exists in four MSS a Gr VS of the Psalm of Habakkuk (Hab 3), a chapter which has been a Jewish lesson for Pentecost from the earliest times, independent of and apparently older than the LXX and made for synagogue use. Similarly in Ezk LXX there is a section of sixteen verses (36 24–38) with a style quite distinct from that of its context. This passage was also an early Christian lesson for Pentecost, and its lectionary use was inherited from Judaism. Here the LXX translators seem to have incorporated the older VS, whereas in Hab 3 they rejected it (JTS, XII, 191; IV, 407).

(3) Partial version of the "Former" Prophets (1–3 R).—The Gr style indicates that the history of the monarchy was not all tr^{d} at once. Ulfilas is said to have omitted these books from the Gothic VS as likely to inflame the military temper of his race; for another reason the Gr translators were at first content with a partial VS. They omitted as unedifying the more disastrous portions, David's sin with the subsequent calamities of his reign and the later history of the divided monarchy culminating in the captivity. Probably the earliest VSS embraced only (1) 1 R, (2) 2 R 1 1—11 1 (David's early reign), (3) 3 R 2 12—21 13 (Solomon and the beginning of the divided monarchy); the third book of "Reigns" opened with the accession of Solomon (as in Lucian's text), not at the point where 1 K opens. These earlier portions are written in a freer style than the rest of the Gr "Reigns," and the Heb original differed widely in places from that tr^{d} in the Eng. Bible (JTS, VIII, 262).

(4) The "Writings."—The Hagiographa at the end of the 2d cent. BC were regarded as national lit. (Sir, prol. "the other books of our fathers"), but not as canonical. The translators did not scruple to treat these with great freedom, undeterred by the prohibition against alteration of Scripture (Dt 4 2; 12 32). Free paraphrases of extracts were produced, sometimes with legendary additions. A partial VS of Job (one-sixth being omitted) was among the first; Aristeas, the historian of the 2d cent. BC, seems to have been acquainted with it (Freudenthal, Hellenistische Studien, 1875, 136 ff). The translator was a student of the Gr poets; his VS was probably produced for the general reader, not for the synagogues. Hatch's theory (Essays in Bib. Gr, 1889, 214) that his Heb text was shorter than ours and was expanded later is untenable; avoidance of anthropomorphisms explains some omissions, the reason for others is obscure. The first Gr narrative of the return from exile (1 Esd) was probably a similar VS of extracts only from Ch-Ezr-Neh, grouped round a fable of non-Jewish origin, the story of the 3 youths at the court of Darius. The work is a fragment, the end being lost, and it has been contended by some critics that the VS once embraced the whole of Ch-Ezr-Neh (C. C. Torrey, Ezra Studies, Chicago, 1910). The Gr is obviously earlier than Esd B and is of great value for the reconstruction of the Heb. The same translator appears from peculiarities of diction to have produced the earliest VS of Dnl, treating it with similar freedom and incorporating extraneous matter (the Three Children, Sus, Bel). The maximum of interpolation is reached in Est, where the Gr additions make up two-thirds of the story. The Gr Prov (probably 1st cent. BC) includes many maxims not in the Heb; some of these appear to be derived from a lost Heb collection, others are of purely Gr origin. This translator also knew and imitated the Gr classics; the numerous fragments of iambic and hexameter verse in the tr cannot be accidental (JTS, XIII, 46). The Psalter is the one tr in this category in which liberties have not been taken; in Ps 13 [14] 3 the extracts from other parts of Pss and from Isa included in the B text must be an interpolation possibly made before St. Paul's time (Rom 3 13 ff), or else taken from Rom. The little Ps 151 in LXX, described in the title as an "autograph" work of David and as "outside the number," is clearly a late Gr production, perhaps an appendix added after the VS was complete.

(5) The latest LXX translations.—The latest VSS included in the LXX are the productions of the Jewish translators of the 2d cent. AD; some books may be rather earlier, the work of pioneers in the new school which advocated strict adherence to the Heb. The books of "Reigns" were now completed, by Theodotion, perhaps, or by one of his school; the later portions (2 R 11 2—3 R 2 11, David's downfall, and 3 R 22—4 R end, the downfall of the monarchy) are by one hand, as shown by peculiarities in style, e.g. "I am have with child" (2 R 11 5) = "I am with child," a use which is due to a desire to distinguish the longer form of the pronoun 'ānōkhī ("I," also used for "I am") from the shorter 'ănī. A complete VS of Jgs was now probably first made. In two cases the old paraphrastic VSS were replaced. Theodotion's Dnl, as above stated, superseded in the Christian church the older VS. A new and complete VS of Ch-Ezr-Neh was made (Esd B), though the older VS retained its place in the Gr Bible on account of the interesting legend imbedded in it; the new VS is here again possibly the work of Theodotion; the numerous transliterations are characteristic of him (Torrey, Ezra Studies; the theory had previously been advanced by Sir H. Howorth). In the Gr Eccl we have a specimen of Aquila's style (see McNeile's ed, Cambridge, 1904). Canticles is another late VS.

2. General Characteristics

A marked feature of the whole tr is the scrupulous avoidance of anthropomorphisms and phrases derogatory to the Divine transcendence. Thus Ex 4 16, "Thou shalt be to him in things pertaining to God" (Heb "for" or "as God"); 15 3, "The Lord is a breaker of battles" (Heb "a Man of war"); 24 10, "They saw the place where the God of Israel stood" (Heb "they saw the God of Israel"); ver 11, "Of the elect of Israel not one perished and they were seen in the place of God" (Heb "Upon the nobles . . . . He laid not His hand, and they beheld God"). The comparison of God to a rock was consistently paraphrased as idolatrous, as was sometimes the comparison to the sun from fear of sun-worship (Ps 83 [84] 12, "The Lord loves mercy and truth" for Heb "The Lord is a sun and shield"). "The sons of God" (Gen 6 2) becomes "the angels of God." For minor liberties, e.g. slight amplifications, interpretation of difficult words, substitution of Gr for Heb coinage, tr of place-names, see Swete, Intro, 323 ff. Blunders in tr are not uncommon, but the difficulties which these pioneers had to face must be remembered, esp. the paleographical character of the Heb originals. These were written on flimsy papyrus rolls, in a script probably in a transitional stage between the archaic and the later square characters; the words were not separated, and there were no vowel-points; two of the radicals (wāw and yōdh) were also frequently omitted. Add to this the absence at Alexandria, for parts at least of the Scriptures, of any sound tradition as to the meaning. On the other hand the vocalization adopted by the translators, e.g. in the proper names, is of great value in the history of early Sem pronunciation. It must further be remembered that the Sem language most familiar to them was not Heb but Aram., and some mistakes are due to Aram. or even Arab. colloquialisms (Swete, Intro, 319).

IX. Salient Differences between Greek and Hebrew Texts.—Differences indicating a Heb original other than the MT affect either the sequence or the subject-matter (cf Swete, Intro, 231 ff).

1. Sequence

The most extensive discrepancies in arrangement of materials occur in (1) Ex 35—39, the construction of the Tabernacle and the ornaments of its ministers, (2) 3 R 4–11, Solomon's reign, (3) Jer (last half), (4) Prov (end). (1) In Ex the LXX gives precedence to the priests' ornaments, which in the Heb follow the account of the Tabernacle, and omits altogether the altar of incense. The whole section describing the execution of the instructions given in the previous chapters in almost identical words is one of the latest portions of the Pent and the text had clearly not been finally fixed in the 3d cent. BC; the section was perhaps absent from the oldest Gr VS. In Ex 20 13–15 cod. B arranges three of the commandments in the Alexandrian order (7, 8, 6), attested in Philo and in the NT. (2) Deliberate rearrangement has taken place in the history of Solomon, and the LXX unquestionably preserves the older text. The narrative of the building of the Temple, like that of the Tabernacle, contains some of the clearest examples of editorial revision in the MT (Wellhausen, Hist of Israel, 67, 280, etc). At the end of 3 R LXX places chs 20 and 21 in their proper order; MT reverses this, interposing the Naboth story in the connected account of the Syr wars and justifying the change by a short preface. (3) In Jer the chapter numbers differ from the middle of ch 25 to the end of ch 51, the historical appendix (ch 52) concluding both texts. This is due to the different position assigned to a group of prophecies against the nations: LXX places them in the center, MT at the end. The items in this group are also rearranged. The diversity in order is earlier than the Gr tr; see JTS, IV, 245. (4) The order of some groups of maxims at the end of Prov was not finally fixed at the time of the Gr tr; like Jeremiah's prophecies against the nations, these little groups seem to have circulated as late as the 2d or 1st cent. BC as separate pamphlets. The Ps numbers from 10 to 147 differ by one in LXX and MT, owing to discrepancies in the lines of demarcation between individual pss.

2. Subject-Matter

Excluding the end of Ex, striking examples of divergence in the Pent are few. LXX alone preserves Cain's words to his brother, "Let us go into the field" (Gen 4 8). The close of Moses' song appears in an expanded form in LXX (Dt 32 43). Similarly Hannah's song in 1 R 2 (? originally a warrior's triumph-song) has been rendered more appropriate to the occasion by the substitution in ver 8*c* of words about the answer to prayer, and enlarged by the insertion of a passage from Jer; the changes in both songs may be connected with their early use as canticles. In Josh the larger amount of divergence suggests that this book did not share the peculiar sanctity of the Law. But the books of "Reigns" present the widest differences and the fullest scope for the textual critic. The LXX here proves the existence of two independent accounts of certain events. Sometimes it incorporates both, while the MT rejects one of them; thus LXX gives (3 R 2 35*a* ff.46*a* ff) a connected summary of events in Solomon's personal history; most of which appear elsewhere in a detached form, 12 24*a–z* is a second account of the dismemberment of the kingdom; 16 28*a-h* a second summary of Jehoshaphat's reign (cf 22 41 ff); 4 R 1 18*a* another summary of Joram's reign (cf 3 1 ff). Conversely in 1 R 17–18, MT has apparently preserved two contradictory accounts of events in David's early history, while LXX presents a shorter and consistent narrative (Swete, Intro, 245 f). An "addition" in LXX of the highest interest appears in 3 R 8 53*b*, where a stanza is put into the mouth of Solomon at the Temple dedication, taken from "the Song-book" (probably the Book of Jashar); the MT gives the stanza in an edited form earlier in the chapter (8 12 f); for the reconstruction of the original Heb see JTS, X, 439; XI, 518. The last line proves to be a title, "For the Sabbath—On Alamoth" (i.e. for sopranos), showing that the song was set to music for liturgical purposes. In Jer, besides transpositions, the two texts differ widely in the way of excess and defect; the verdict of critics is mainly in favor of the priority of the LXX (Streane, Double Text of Jer, 1896). For divergences in the "Writings" see VIII, above; for additional titles to the Pss see Swete, Intro, 250 f.

Literature.—The most important works have been mentioned in the body of the article. See, further, the very full lists in Swete's Intro and the bibliographies by Nestle in *PRE*³, III, 1–24, and XXIII, 207–10 (1913); HDB, IV, 453–54.

SEPULCHRE, sep′ul-kẽr (2 Ch 21 20; 32 33; Jn 19 41 f; Acts 2 29, etc). See Burial; Jerusalem, VIII.

SERAH, sē′ra (שֶׂרַח, serah, "abundance"): Daughter of Asher (Gen 46 17; Nu 26 46, AV "Sarah"; 1 Ch 7 30).

SERAIAH, sḗ-rā′ya, sḗ-rī′a (שְׂרָיָהוּ, *s*ᵉ*rāyāhū*, "Jeh hath prevailed"; LXX Σαραίας, Saraías, or Σαραία, Saraía):

(1) Secretary of David (2 S 8 17); in 2 S 20 25 he is called Sheva; in 1 K 4 3 the name appears as Shisha. This last or Shasha would be restored elsewhere by some critics; others prefer the form Shavsha, which is found in 1 Ch 18 16.

(2) A high priest in the reign of Zedekiah; executed with other prominent captives at Riblah by order of Nebuchadnezzar (2 K 25 18.21; Jer 52 24.27). Mentioned in the list of high priests (1 Ch 6 14). Ezra claims descent from him (Ezr 7 1[3]). See Azaraias; Saraias.

(3) The son of Tanhumeth the Netophathite, and one of the heroic band of men who saved themselves from the fury of Nebuchadnezzar when he stormed Jerus. They repaired to Gedaliah, the son of Ahikam, but killed him on account of his allegiance to the Chaldaeans (2 K 25 23.25).

(4) Son of Kenaz, and younger brother of Othniel, and father of Joab, the chief of Ge-harashim (1 Ch 4 13.14).

(5) Grandfather of Jehu, of the tribe of Simeon (1 Ch 4 35).

(6) A priest, the third in the list of those who returned from Babylon to Jerus with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 2; Neh 7 7, here called Azariah; 12 1), and third also (if the same person is meant) in the record of those who sealed the covenant binding all Jews not to take foreign wives (Neh 10 2). As the son of Hilkiah, and consequently a direct descendant of the priestly family, he became governor of the temple when it was rebuilt (Neh 11 11). He is mentioned (under the name Azariah) also in 1 Ch 9 11. Neh 12 2 adds that "in the days of Joiakim" the head of Seraiah's house was Meraiah.

(7) Son of Azriel, one of those whom Jehoiakim commanded to imprison Jeremiah and Baruch, the son of Neriah (Jer 36 26).

(8) The son of Neriah, who went into exile with Zedekiah. He was also called *Sar M*ᵉ*nūḥāh* ("prince of repose"). The Tg renders *Sar M*ᵉ*nūḥāh* by Rabh Tīḳrabhtā', "prince of battle," and LXX by ἄρχων δώρων, árchōn dṓrōn, "prince of gifts," reading Minḥah for *M*ᵉ*nūḥāh*. At the request of Jeremiah he carried with him in his exile the passages containing the prophet's warning of the fall of Babylon, written in a book which he was bidden to bind to a stone and cast into the Euphrates, to symbolize the fall of Babylon (Jer 51 59–64).

Horace J. Wolf

SERAPHIM, ser′a-fim (שְׂרָפִים, *s*ᵉ*rāphīm*): A pl. word occurring only in Isa 6 2 ff—Isaiah's vision of Jeh. The origin of the term in Heb is uncertain. Sārāph in Nu 21 6; Isa 14 29, etc, signifies a fiery serpent. A Bab name for the fire-god, Nergal, was Sharrapu. In Egypt there have been found eagle-lion-shaped figures guarding a grave, to which is applied the name seref. The equivalent Eng. term is "griffin."

It is probable enough that popular mythology connected fire with the attendants of the deity in various ways among different peoples, and that burning lies at the base of the idea in all these suggested etymologies. It remains, however, that in Isaiah's use there is nothing of the popular legend or superstition. These seraphim are august beings whose forms are not at all fully described. They had faces, feet, hands and wings. The six wings, in three pairs, covered their faces and feet in humility and reverence, and were used for sustaining them in their positions about the throne of Jeh. One of them is the agent for burning (with a coal off the altar, not with his own power or person) the sin from the lips of the prophet.

Seraphim are in Jewish theology connected with cherubim and ophanim as the three highest orders of attendants on Jeh, and are superior to the angels who are messengers sent on various errands. As the cherubim in popular fancy were represented by the storm-clouds, so the seraphim were by the serpentine flashes of the lightning; but none of this appears in Isaiah's vision.

In the NT the only possible equivalent is in "the living ones" ("beasts" of AV) in Rev 4, 5, etc. Here, as in Isa, they appear nearest Jeh's throne, supreme in praise of His holiness.

William Owen Carver

SERAR, sē′rär (Σεράρ, Serár; AV Aserer): Name of one of the families which returned with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 32) = "Sisera" of Ezr 2 53; Neh 7 55.

SERED, sē′red (סֶרֶד, ṣeredh): Son of Zebulun (Gen 46 14; Nu 26 26).

SERGIUS PAULUS, sûr′ji-us pô′lus. See Paulus, Sergius.

SERJEANTS, sär′jents, -jants (ῥαβδοῦχοι, rhabdoúchoi): In Acts 16 35.38 the word (lit. "holders of rods," corresponding to Rom "lictors," thus RVm) is used of the officers in attendance on the Philippian magistrates, whose duty it was to execute orders in scourging, etc, in this case in setting prisoners free. Paul and Silas, however, as Romans, refused thus to be "privily" dismissed.

VII. Principles
Literature

The Sermon on the Mount is the title commonly given to the collection of sayings recorded in Mt 5–7 and in Lk 6 20–49. The latter is sometimes called the Sermon on the Plain from the fact that it is said to have been delivered on a level space somewhere on the descent of the mountain. The Sermon appears to be an epitome of the teachings of Jesus concerning the kingdom of heaven, its subjects and their life. For this reason it has always held the first place of attention and esteem among the sayings of Jesus. See Sermon on the Plain.

I. Parallel Accounts.—As indicated above, the Sermon is reported by both Matthew and Luke.

A comparison of the two accounts reveals certain striking differences. A total of 47 verses of the account in Mt have no parallel in Lk, while but 4½ verses of the latter are wanting in the former. On the other hand, many of the sayings in Mt that are lacking in the Sermon of Lk, amounting in all to 34 verses, appear elsewhere distributed throughout the Lukan narrative and in some instances connected with different incidents and circumstances.

These facts give rise to some interesting literary and historical questions: Do the two accounts represent two distinct discourses dealing with the same general theme but spoken on different occasions, or are they simply different reports of the same discourse? If it be held that the Sermon was delivered but once, which of the accounts represents more closely the original address? Is the discourse in Mt homogeneous or does it include sayings originally spoken on other occasions and early incorporated in the Sermon in the gospel tradition?

II. Historicity of the Discourse.—There have been and are today scholars who regard the sermons recorded in Mt and Lk as collections of sayings spoken on different occasions, and maintain that they do not represent any connected discourse ever delivered by Jesus. In their view the Sermon is either a free compilation by the evangelists or a product of apostolic teaching and oral tradition.

The prevailing opinion among NT scholars is, however, that the gospel accounts represent a genuine historical discourse. The Sermon as recorded in Mt bears such marks of inner unity of theme and exposition as to give the appearance of genuineness. That Jesus should deliver a discourse of this kind accords with all the circumstances and with the purpose of His ministry. Besides, we know that in His teaching He was accustomed to speak to the multitudes at length, and we should expect Him to give early in His ministry some formal exposition of the kingdom, the burden of His first preaching. That such a summary of one of His most important discourses should have been preserved is altogether probable.

On the other hand, it may be conceded that the accounts need not necessarily be regarded as full or exact reports of the discourse but possibly and probably rather summaries of its theme and substance. Our Lord was accustomed to teach at length, but this discourse could easily be delivered in a few minutes. Again, while His popular teaching was marked by a unique wealth of illustration the Sermon is largely gnomic in form. This gnomic style and the paucity of the usual concrete and illustrative elements suggest the probability of condensation in transmission. Moreover, it is hardly probable that such an address of Jesus would be recorded at the time of its delivery or would be remembered in detail.

There is evidence that the account in Mt 5–7 contains some sayings not included in the original discourse. This view is confirmed by the fact that a number of the sayings are given in Luke's Gospel in settings that appear more original. It is easy to believe that related sayings spoken on other occasions may have become associated with the Sermon in apostolic teaching and thus handed down with it, but if the discourse were well known in a specific form, such as that recorded in Mt, it is hardly conceivable that Luke or anyone else would break it up and distribute the fragments or associate them with other incidents, as some of the sayings recorded in both Gospels are found associated in Lk.

III. Time and Occasion.—Both Matthew and Luke agree in assigning the delivery of the Sermon to the first half of the Galilean ministry. The former apparently places it a little earlier than the latter, in whose account it follows immediately after the appointment of the twelve apostles. While the time cannot be accurately determined, the position assigned by the Gospels is approximately correct and is supported by the internal evidence. Portions of the Sermon imply that the opposition of the religious teachers was already in evidence, but it clearly belongs to the first year of Our Lord's ministry before that opposition had become serious. On the other hand, the occasion was sufficiently late for the popularity of the new Teacher to have reached its climax. In the early Galilean ministry Jesus confined His teaching to the synagogues, but later, when the great crowds pressed about Him, He resorted to open-air preaching after the manner of the Sermon. Along with the growth in His popularity there is observed a change in the character of His teaching. His earlier message may be summed up in the formula, "Repent ye; for the kingdom of heaven is at hand" (Mt 4 17). Later, both in His public discourses and in His more intimate conferences with His disciples, He was occupied with the principles of the kingdom. The Sermon on the Mount belongs to this later type of teaching and fits naturally into the circumstances to which it has been assigned. Luke probably gives the true historical occasion, i.e. the appointment of the Twelve.

IV. Scene.—According to the evangelists, the scene of the delivery of the Sermon was one of the mountains or foothills surrounding the Galilean plain. Probably one of the hills lying N.W. of Capernaum is meant, for shortly after the Sermon we find Jesus and His disciples entering that city. There are no data justifying a closer identification of the place. There is a tradition dating from the time of the Crusades that identifies the mount of the Sermon with Ḳarn Ḥaṭṭîn, a two-peaked hill on the road from Tiberias to Nazareth, but there are no means of confirming this late tradition and the identification is rather improbable.

V. The Hearers.—The Sermon was evidently addressed, primarily, to the disciples of Jesus. This is the apparent meaning of the account of both evangelists. According to Matthew, Jesus, "seeing the multitudes, ... went up into the mountain: and when he had sat down, his disciples came unto him: and he opened his mouth and taught them." The separation from the multitudes and the direction of His words to the disciples seem clear, and the distinction appears intentional on the part of the writer. However, it must be observed that in the closing comments on the Sermon the presence of the multitudes is implied. In Luke's account the distinction is less marked. Here the order of events is: the night of prayer in the mountain, the choice of the twelve apostles, the descent with them into the presence of the multitude of His disciples and a great number of people from Judaea, Jerus and the coast country, the healing of great numbers, and, finally, the address. While the continued presence of the multitudes is implied, the plain meaning of the words, "And he lifted up his eyes on his disciples, and said," is that his address was intended esp. for the latter. This view is borne out by the address itself as recorded in both accounts. Observe the use of the second person in the reference to suffering, poverty and persecution for the sake of the Son of Man. Further the sayings concerning the "salt of the earth" and "the light of the world" could hardly have been addressed to any but His disciples. The term disciple, however, was doubtless employed in the broader sense by both evangelists. This is clearly the case in Matthew's account, according to which the Twelve had not yet been appointed.

VI. The Message: A Summary.—It is hardly proper to speak of the Sermon on the Mount as a digest of the teaching of Jesus, for it does not include any reference to some very important subjects discussed by Our Lord on other occasions in the course of His ministry. It is, however, the most comprehensive and important collection or summary of His sayings that is preserved to us in the gospel record. For this reason the Sermon properly holds in Christian thought the first place of esteem among all the NT messages. As an exposition of the ideal life and the program of the new society which Jesus proposed to create, its interpretation is of the deepest interest and the profoundest concern.

1. Analysis

It may assist the student of the Sermon in arriving at a clear appreciation of the argument and the salient features of the discourse if the whole is first viewed in outline. There is some difference of opinion among scholars as to certain features of the analysis, and consequently various outlines have been presented by different writers. Those of C. W. Votaw in HDB, Canon Gore in The Sermon on the Mount, and H. C. King in The Ethics of Jesus are worthy of special mention. The following analysis of the Sermon as recorded by Matthew is given as the basis of the present discussion.

It is not implied that there was any such formal plan before the mind of Jesus as He spoke, but it is believed that the outline presents a faithful syllabus of the argument of the Sermon as preserved to us.

THEME: THE KINGDOM OF GOD (HEAVEN), ITS SUBJECTS AND ITS RIGHTEOUSNESS (5 3—7 27).

I. The subjects of the kingdom (5 3–16).
   1. The qualities of character essential to happiness and influence (vs 3–12).
   2. The vocation of the subjects (vs 13–16).
II. The relation of the new righteousness to the Mosaic Law (5 17–48).
   1. The relation defined as that of continuance in a higher fulfilment (vs 17–20).
   2. The higher fulfilment of the new righteousness illustrated by a comparison of its principles with the Mosaic Law as currently taught and practised (vs 21–48).
      (1) The higher law of brotherhood judges ill-will as murder (vs 21–26).
      (2) The higher law of purity condemns lust as adultery (vs 27–32).
      (3) The higher law of truth forbids oaths as unnecessary and evil (vs 33–37).
      (4) The higher law of rights substitutes self-restraint and generosity for retaliation and resistance (vs 38–42).
      (5) The higher law of love demands universal good will of a supernatural quality like that of the Father (vs 43–48).
III. The new righteousness. Its motives as applied to religious, practical and social duties, or the principles of conduct (6 1—7 12).
   1. Reverence toward the Father essential in all acts of worship (6 1–18).
      (1) In all duties (ver 1).
      (2) In almsgiving (vs 2–4).
      (3) In prayer (vs 5–15).
      (4) In fasting (vs 16–18).
   2. Loyalty toward the Father fundamental in all activities (6 19–34).
      (1) In treasure-seeking (vs 19–24).
      (2) In trustful devotion to the kingdom and the Father's righteousness (vs 25–34).
   3. Love toward the Father dynamic in all social relations (7 1–12).
      (1) Critical estimate of self instead of censorious judgment of others (vs 1–5).
      (2) Discrimination in the communication of spiritual values (ver 6).
      (3) Kindness toward others in all things like the Father's kindness toward all His children (vs 7–12).
IV. Hortatory conclusion (7 13–27).
   1. The two gates and the two ways (vs 13–14).
   2. The tests of character (vs 15–27).

2. Argument: The Kingdom of God (Heaven)

(1) Characteristics of the subjects (5 3–12).—The Sermon opens with the familiar Beatitudes. Unlike many reformers, Jesus begins the exposition of His program with a promise of happiness, with a blessing rather than a curse. He thus connects His program directly with the hopes of His hearers, for the central features in the current Messianic conception were deliverance and happiness. But the conditions of happiness proposed were in strong contrast with those in the popular thought. Happiness does not consist, says Jesus, in what one possesses, in lands and houses, in social position, in intellectual attainments, but in the wealth of the inner life, in moral strength, in self-control, in spiritual insight, in the character one is able to form within himself and in the service he is able to render to his fellowmen. Happiness, then, like character, is a by-product of right living. It is presented as the fruit, not as the object of endeavor.

It is interesting to note that character is the secret of happiness both for the individual and for society. There are two groups of Beatitudes. The first four deal with personal qualities: humility, penitence, self-control, desire for righteousness. These are the sources of inner peace. The second group deals with social qualities; mercifulness toward others, purity of heart or reverence for personality, peacemaking or solicitude for others, self-sacrificing loyalty to righteousness. These are the sources of social rest. The blessings of the kingdom are social as well as individual.

(2) Vocation of the subjects (5 13–16).—Men of the qualities described in the Beatitudes are called "the salt of the earth," "the light of the world." Their happiness is not, then, in themselves or for themselves alone. Their mission is the hope of the kingdom. Salt is a preservative element; light is a life-giving one; but the world is not eager to be preserved or willing to receive life. Therefore such men must expect opposition and persecution, but they are not on that account to withdraw from the world. On the contrary, by the leaven of character and the light of example they are to help others in the appreciation and the attainment of the ideal life. By their character and deeds they are to make their influence a force for good in the lives of men. In this sense the men of the kingdom are the salt of the earth, the light of the world. See BEATITUDES.

(3) The relation of the new righteousness to the Mosaic Law (5 17–48).—(a) Relation defined (5 17–20): The qualities of character thus set before the citizens of the kingdom were so surprising and revolutionary as to suggest the inquiry: What is the relation of the new teaching to the Mosaic Law? This Jesus defines as continuance and fulfilment. His hearers are not to think that He has come to destroy the law. On the contrary, He has come to conserve and fulfil. The old law is imperfect, but God does not despair of what is imperfect. Men and institutions are judged, not by the level of present attainment, but by character and direction. The law moves in the right direction and is so valuable that those who violate even its least precepts have a very low place in the kingdom.

The new righteousness then does not set aside the law or offer an easier religion, but one that is more exacting. The kingdom is concerned, not so much with ceremonies and external rules, as with motives and with social virtues, with self-control, purity, honesty and generosity. So much higher are the new standards of righteousness that Jesus is constrained to warn His hearers that to secure even a place in the kingdom, their righteousness must exceed that of the scribes and Pharisees.

(b) The relation illustrated (5 21–48): In illustration of the deeper meaning of the new righteousness and its relation to the Mosaic Law, Jesus proceeds to deal in detail with the precepts of the old moral law, deepening it as He proceeds into the higher law of the kingdom. In each instance the standard of judgment is raised and the individual precepts are deepened into spiritual principles that call for perfect fulfilment. In considering specific precepts no account is taken of overt acts, for in the new righteousness they are impossible. All acts are treated as expressions of the inner life. The law is carried back to the impulse and the will to sin, and these are judged as in the old law the completed acts were judged. Therefore all anger and lust in the heart are strictly enjoined. Likewise every word is raised to a sacredness equal with that of the most solemn religious vow or oath. Finally, the instinct to avenge is entirely forbidden, and universal love like that of the Father is made the fundamental law of the new social life. Thus Jesus does not abrogate any law but interprets its precepts in terms that call for a deeper and more perfect fulfilment.

(4) Motives and principles of conduct (6 1—7 12*).—The relation of His teaching to the law defined, Jesus proceeds to explain the motives and principles of conduct as applied to religious and social duties.

(a) In worship (6 1–18): In the section 6 1—7 12 there is one central thought. All righteousness looks toward God. He is at once the source and the aim of life. Therefore worship aims alone at Divine praise. If acts of worship are performed before men to be seen of them there is no reward for them before the Father. In this Jesus is passing no slight on public worship. He Himself instituted the Lord's Supper and authorized the continuance of the rite of baptism. Such acts have their proper value. His censure is aimed at the love of ostentation so often associated with them. The root of ostentation is selfishness, and selfishness has no part in the new righteousness. Any selfish desire for the approval of men thwarts the purpose of all worship. The object of almsgiving, of prayer or of fasting is the expression of brotherly love, communion with God or spiritual enrichment. The possibility of any of these is excluded by the presence of the desire for the approval of men. It is not merely a Divine fiat but one of the deeper laws of life which decrees that the only possible reward for acts of worship performed from such false motives is the cheap approval of men as well as the impoverishment of the inner life.

(b) In life's purpose (6 19–34): The same principle holds, says Jesus, in the matter of life's purpose. There is only one treasure worthy of man's search, only one object worthy of his highest endeavor, and that is the kingdom of God and His righteousness. Besides, there can be no division of aim. God will be first and only. Material blessings must not be set before duty to Him or to men. With any lower aim the new righteousness would be no better than that of the Gentiles. And such a demand is reasonable, for God's gracious providence is ample guaranty that He will supply all things needful for the accomplishment of the purposes He has planned for our lives. So in our vocations as in our worship, God is the supreme and effectual motive.

(c) In social relations (7 1–12): Then again because God is our Father and the supreme object of desire for all men, great reverence is due toward others. Considerate helpfulness must replace the censorious spirit. For the same reason men will have too great reverence for spiritual values to cast them carelessly before the unworthy. Moreover, because God is so gracious and ready to bestow the best gifts freely upon His children, the men of the kingdom are under profound obligation to observe the higher law of brotherhood expressed in the Golden Rule: "All things . . . . whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, even so do ye also unto them." Thus in the perfect law of the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of men the new righteousness makes perfect the Law and the Prophets.

(5) Hortatory conclusion (7 13–27*).—(a) The narrow way (7 13–14): In the hortatory conclusion (7 13–27), Jesus first of all warns His hearers that the way into the kingdom is a narrow one. It might seem that it ought to be different; that the way to destruction should be narrow and difficult, and the way to life broad and easy, but it is not so. The way to all worthy achievement is the narrow way of self-control, self-sacrifice and infinite pains. Such is the way to the righteousness of the kingdom, the supreme object of human endeavor. "Narrow is the gate, and straitened the way, that leadeth unto life."

(b) The tests of character (7 15–27): The test of the higher fulfilment is fruit. By their fruits alone the subjects of the kingdom will be known. In the presence of the Father there is no room for those who bring nothing but the leaves of empty professions. The kingdom is for those alone who do His will. The test of righteousness is illustrated in conclusion by the beautiful parable of the Two Builders. The difference between the two is essentially one of character. It is largely a question of fundamental honesty. The one is superficial and thinks only of that which is visible to the eye and builds only for himself and for the present. The other is honest enough to build well where only God can see, to build for others and for all time. Thus he builds also for himself. The character of the builder is revealed by the building.

VII. Principles.—The Sermon on the Mount is neither an impractical ideal nor a set of fixed legal regulations. It is, instead, a statement of the principles of life essential in a normal society. Such a society is possible in so far as men attain the character and live the life expressed in these principles. Their correct interpretation is therefore important.

Many of the sayings of the Sermon are metaphorical or proverbial statements, and are not to be understood in a literal or legal sense. In them Jesus was illustrating principles in concrete terms. Their interpretation literally as legal enactments is contrary to the intention and spirit of Jesus. So interpreted, the Sermon becomes in part a visionary and impractical ideal. But rather the principles behind the concrete instances are to be sought and applied anew to the life of the present as Jesus applied them to the life of His own time.

The following are some of the leading ideas and principles underlying and expressed in the Sermon:

(1) Character is the secret of happiness and strength. Men of the qualities described in the Beatitudes are called "blessed." Happiness consists, not in external blessings, but in the inner poise of a normal life. The virtues of the Beatitudes are also the elements of strength. Humility, self-control, purity and loyalty are the genuine qualities of real strength. Men of such qualities are to inherit the earth because they are the only ones strong enough to possess and use it.

(2) Righteousness is grounded in the inner life. Character is not something imposed from without but a life that unfolds from within. The hope of a perfect morality and a genuine fulfilment of the law lies in the creation of a sound inner life. Therefore the worth of all religious acts and all personal and social conduct is judged by the quality of the inner motives.

(3) The inner life is a unity. The spiritual nature is all of a piece, so that a moral slump at one point imperils the whole life. Consequently a rigid and exacting spiritual asceticism, even to the extent of extreme major surgery, is sometimes expedient and necessary. "If thy right eye causeth thee to stumble, pluck it out, and cast it from thee: for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not thy whole body be cast into Gehenna" (Mt 5 29m).

(4) Universal love is the fundamental social law. It is the dynamic principle of true character and right conduct. In this respect, at least, the perfection of the Father is set as the standard for men. Kindliness in disposition, in word and in act is an obligation binding on all. We may not feel alike toward all, but our wills must be set to do good even to our enemies. In this the supernatural quality of the Christian life may be known.

(5) The Sermon sets the fact of God the Father at the center of life. Character and life exist in and for fellowship with the Father. All worship and conduct look toward God. His service is the supreme duty, His perfection the standard of character, His goodness the ground of universal love. Given this fact, all the essentials of religion and life follow as a matter of course. God is Father, all men are brothers. God is Father, all duties are sacred. God is Father, infinite love is at the heart of the world and life is of infinite worth.

(6) Fulfilment is the final test of life. The blossoms of promises must ripen into the fruit of abiding character. The leaves of empty professions have no value in the eyes of the Father. Deeds and character are the only things that abide, and endurance is the final test. The life of perfect fulfilment is the life anchored on the rock of ages. See further Ethics; Ethics of Jesus; Kingdom of God.

Literature.—The standard comms. and Lives of Christ. Among the most important encyclopaedic arts. are those of C. W. Votaw in HDB, James Moffatt in EB and W. F. Adeney in DCG. The following are a few of the most helpful separate volumes on the subject: A. Tholuck, Exposition of Christ's Sermon on the Mount; Canon Gore, The Sermon on the Mount; B. W. Bacon, The Sermon on the Mount; W. B. Carpenter, The Great Charter of Christ; Hubert Foston, The Beatitudes and the Contrasts; cf H. C. SERMON ON THE PLAIN, THE: This title is sometimes given to the discourse recorded in Lk 6 20–49, because according to the Gospel (ver 17) it was delivered on a plain at the foot of the mountain. In many respects this address resembles the one recorded in Mt 5–7, but in general the two are so different as to make it uncertain whether they are different reports of the same discourse or reports of different addresses given on different occasions. See Sermon on the Mount.

1. The Occasion

In contrast with the Sermon on the Mount which is assigned a place early in the Galilean ministry, and prior to the appointment of the Twelve, that event is represented as the occasion of this discourse. If the two accounts are reports of the same address the setting of Lk is probably the historical one.

2. Contents

The Sermon of Lk includes a little less than one-third of the matter recorded in the Sermon on the Mount. The Lukan discourse includes only a portion of the Beatitudes, with a set of four "woes," a rather brief section on the social duties, and the concluding parable of the Two Houses.

3. Message

The Gospel of Lk has been called the social Gospel because of its sympathy with the poor and its emphasis on the duty of kindliness of spirit. This social interest is esp. prominent in the Sermon. Here the Beatitudes deal with social differences. In Mt they refer to spiritual conditions. Here Jesus speaks of those who hunger now, probably meaning bodily hunger. In Mt the reference is to hunger and thirst after righteousness. In Mt the invectives are addressed against the self-satisfied religious teachers and their religious formalism. Here the rich and their unsocial spirit are the subject of the woes. This social interest is further emphasized by the fact that in addition to this social bearing of the Beatitudes, Lk's discourse omits the remainder of the Sermon on the Mount, except those portions that deal with social relations, such as those on the Golden Rule, the duty of universal love, the equality of servant and master, and the obligation of a charitable spirit. SERON, sē′ron (Σήρων, Sḗrōn): "The commander of the host of Syria" of Antiochus Epiphanes, who was defeated at Beth-horon by Judas in 166 BC (1 Macc 3 13 ff). Not a Gr name; "perhaps it represents the Phoen Hiram" (Rawlinson, ad loc.).

SERPENT, sûr′pent: Serpents are not particularly abundant in Pal, but they are often mentioned in the Bible. In the Heb there are 11 names. The NT has four Gr names and LXX employs two of these and three others as well as several compound expressions, such as ὄφις πετάμενος, óphis petámenos, "flying serpent," ὄφις θανατῶν, óphis thanatṓn, "deadly serpent," and ὄφις δάκνων, óphis dáknōn, "biting" or "stinging serpent." Notwithstanding this large vocabulary, it is impossible to identify satisfactorily a single species. Nearly every reference states or implies poisonous qualities, and in no case is there so much as a hint that a snake may be harmless, except in several expressions referring to the millennium, where their harmlessness is not natural but miraculous. In Arab. there is a score or more of names of serpents, but very few of them are employed at all definitely. It may be too much to say that the inhabitants of Syria and Pal consider all snakes to be poisonous, but they do not clearly distinguish the non-poisonous ones, and there are several common and well-known species which are universally believed to be poisonous, though actually harmless. Of nearly 25 species which are certainly known to be found in Syria and Pal, four are deadly poisonous, five are somewhat poisonous, and the rest are absolutely harmless. With the exception of ḳippōz, "dart-snake" (Isa 34 15), which is probably the name of a bird and not of a snake, every one of the Heb and Gr names occurs in passages where poisonous character is expressed or implied. The deadly poisonous snakes have large perforated poison fangs situated in the front of the upper jaw, an efficient apparatus like a hypodermic syringe for conveying the poison into the depths of the wound. In the somewhat poisonous snakes, the poison fangs are less favorably situated, being farther back, nearly under the eye. Moreover, they are smaller and are merely grooved on the anterior aspect instead of being perforated. All snakes, except a few which are nearly or quite toothless, have numerous small recurved teeth for holding and helping to swallow the prey, which is usually taken into the stomach while living, the peculiar structure of the jaws and the absence of a breastbone enabling snakes to swallow animals which exceed the ordinary size of their own bodies.

2. Serpents of Pal and Syria

The following list includes all the serpents which are certainly known to exist in Pal and Syria, omitting the names of several which have been reported but whose occurrence does not seem to be sufficiently confirmed. The range of each species is given.

(1) Harmless serpents.—Typhlops vermicularis Merr., Greece and Southwestern Asia; T. simoni Bttgr., Pal; Eryx jaculus L., Greece, North Africa, Central and Southwestern Asia; Tropidonotus tessellatus Laur., Central and Southeastern Europe, Central and Southwestern Asia; Zamenis gemonensis Laur., Central and Southeastern Europe, Gr islands, Southwestern Asia; Z. dahlii Fitz., Southeastern Europe, Southwestern Asia, Lower Egypt; Z. rhodorhachis Jan., Egypt, Southwestern Asia, India; Z. ravergieri Menatr., Southwestern Asia; Z. nummifer Renss., Egypt, Syria, Pal, Cyprus, Asia Minor; Oligodon melanocephalus Jan., Syria, Pal, Sinai, Lower Egypt; Contia decemlineata D. and B., Syria, Pal; C. collaris Menetr., Gr islands, Cyprus, Asia Minor, Syria, Pal; C. rothi Jan., Syria, Pal; C. coronella Schleg., Syria, Pal.

(2) Somewhat poisonous serpents.—Tarbophis savignyi Blgr., Syria, Pal, Egypt; T. fallax Fleischm., Balkan Peninsula, Gr islands, Cyprus, Asia Minor, Syria, Pal; Coelopeltis monspessulana Herm., Mediterranean countries, Caucasus, Persia; Psammophis schokari Forsk., North Africa, Southwestern Asia; Micrelaps muelleri Bttgr., Syria, Pal.

(3) Deadly poisonous serpents.—Vipera ammodytes L., Southeastern Europe, Asia Minor, Syria; Vipera lebetina L., North Africa, Gr islands, Southwestern Asia; Cerastes cornutus Forsk., Egypt, Sinai, Arabia; Echis coloratus Gthr., Southern Pal, Arabia, Socotra.

To this list should be added the scheltopusik, a large snake-like, limbless lizard, Ophiosaurus apus, inhabiting Southeastern Europe, Asia Minor, Persia, Syria and Pal, which while perfectly harmless is commonly classed with vipers.

Of all these the commonest is Zamenis nummifer, Arab. عَقْدُ ٱلْجَوْز, 'aḳd-ul-jauz, "string of walnuts," a fierce but non-poisonous snake which attains the length of a meter. Its ground color is pale yellow and it has a dorsal series of distinct diamond-shaped dark spots. Alternating with spots of the dorsal row are on each side two lateral rows of less distinct dark spots. It is everywhere considered to be fatal. Another common snake is Zamenis gemonensis, Arab. حَنَش, ḥanash, which attains the length of two meters. It is usually black and much resembles the American black snake, Zamenis constrictor. Like all species of Zamenis, these are harmless. Other common harmless snakes are Zamenis dahlii, Tropidonotus tessellatus which is often found in pools and streams, Contia collaris, Oligodon melanocephalus, a small, nearly toothless snake with the crown of the head coal black.

Among the somewhat poisonous snakes, a very common one is Coelopeltis monspessulana, Arab. الحَيَّة البَرْشَة, al-ḥaiyat ul-barshat, which is about two meters long, as large as the black snake. It is uniformly reddish brown above, paler below. Another is Psammophis schokari, Arab. النَّشَّاب, an-nashshâb, "the arrow." It is about a meter long, slender, and white with dark stripes. Many marvelous and utterly improbable tales are told of its jumping powers, as for instance that it can shoot through the air for more than a hundred feet and penetrate a tree like a rifle bullet.

The commonest of the deadly poisonous snakes is Vipera lebetina, which attains the length of a meter, has a thick body, a short tail, a broad head and a narrow neck. It is spotted somewhat as Zamenis nummifer, but the spots are less regular and distinct and the ground color is grey rather than yellow. It does not seem to have a distinct name. Cerastes cornutus, having two small horns, which are modified scales, over the eyes, is a small but dangerous viper, and is found in the south. Not only are the species of poisonous serpents fewer than the non-poisonous species, but the individuals also appear to be less numerous. The vast majority of the snakes which are encountered are harmless.

3. Names

As stated above, all of the Heb and Gr names except ḳippōz, which occurs only in Isa 34 15, are used of snakes actually or supposedly poisonous. This absence of discrimination between poisonous and non-poisonous kinds makes determination of the species difficult. Further, but few of the Heb names are from roots whose meanings are clear, and there is little evident relation to Arab. names.

(1) The commonest Heb word is נָחָשׁ, nāḥāsh, which occurs 31 t and seems to be a generic word for serpent. While not always clearly indicating a venomous serpent, it frequently does: e.g. Ps 58 4; 140 3; Prov 23 32; Eccl 10 8.11; Isa 14 29; Jer 8 17; Am 5 19. According to BDB it is perhaps from an onomatopoetic √, נָחַשׁ, nāḥash, "to hiss." It may be akin to the Arab. حَنَش, ḥanash, which means "snake" in general, or esp. the black snake. Cf Ir-nahash (1 Ch 4 12); Nahash (a) (1 S 11 1; 2 S 10 2), (b) (2 S 17 27), (c) (2 S 17 25); also נְחֹשֶׁת, neḥōsheth, "copper" or "brass"; and נְחֻשְׁתָּן, neḥushtān, "Nehushtan," the brazen serpent (2 K 18 4). But BDB derives the last two words from a different root.

(2) שָׂרָף, sārāph, apparently from שָׂרַף, sāraph, "to burn," is used of the fiery serpents of the wilderness. In Nu 21 8, it occurs in the sing.: "Make thee a fiery serpent, and set it upon a standard." In ver 6 we have הַנְּחָשִׁים הַשְּׂרָפִים, ha-neḥāshīm ha-serāphīm, "fiery serpents"; in Dt 8 15 the same in the sing.: נָחָשׁ שָׂרָף, nāḥāsh sārāph, also trd "fiery serpents"; in Isa 14 29; 30 6 we have שָׂרָף מְעוֹפֵף, sārāph meʽōphēph, "fiery flying serpent." The same word in the pl. שְׂרָפִים, serāphīm, is trd "seraphim" in Isa 6 2.6.

(3) תַּנִּין, tannīn, elsewhere "dragon" or "sea-monster" (q.v.), is used of the serpents into which the rods of Aaron and the magicians were transformed (Ex 7 9.10.12), these serpents being designated by nāḥāsh in Ex 4 3; 7 15. Tannīn is rendered "serpent" (AV "dragon") in Dt 32 33, "Their wine is the poison of serpents," and Ps 91 13, "The young lion and the serpent shalt thou trample under foot." On the other hand, nāḥāsh seems in three passages to refer to a mythical creature or dragon: "His hand hath pierced the swift serpent" (Job 26 13); "In that day Jeh . . . . will punish leviathan the swift serpent and leviathan the crooked serpent" (Isa 27 1); ". . . . though they be hid from my sight in the bottom of the sea, thence will I command the serpent, and it shall bite them" (Am 9 3).

(4) זֹחֲלֵי, zōḥălē, is trd "crawling things" in Dt 32 24 (AV "serpents") and in Mic 7 17 (AV "worms").

(5) עַכְשׁוּב, ʽakhshūbh, occurs only in Ps 140 3, where it is trd "adder" (LXX ἀσπίς, aspís, Vulg aspis), "adders' poison is under their lips." It has been suggested (BDB) that the reading should be עַכָּבִישׁ, ʽakkābhīsh, "spider" (q.v.). The ‖ word in the previous line is nāḥāsh.

(6) פֶּתֶן, pethen, like most of the other names a word of uncertain etymology, occurs 6 t and it is trd "asp," except in Ps 91 13, "Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder." According to Liddell and Scott, aspis is the name of the Egyp cobra, Naia haje L., which is not included in (2) above, because it does not certainly appear to have been found in Pal. The name "adder" is applied to various snakes all of which may perhaps be supposed to be poisonous but some of which are actually harmless. Aspis occurs in Rom 3 13 in a paraphrase of Ps 140 3 (see [5] above); it occurs frequently, though not uniformly, in LXX for (2), (5), (6), (7), (8) and (10).

(7) צֶפַע, çephaʽ, occurs only in Isa 14 29 where it is trd "adder" (AV "cockatrice," ERV "basilisk," LXX ἔκγονα ἀσπίδων, ékgona aspídōn, Vulg regulus). The √ צָפַע, çāphaʽ, of (7) and (8) may be an onomatopoetic word meaning "to hiss" (BDB).

(8) צִפְעוֹנִי, or צִפְעֹנִי, çiphʽōnī, occurs in Prov 23 32, "At the last it biteth like a serpent [nāḥāsh], and stingeth like an adder" (çiphʽōnī). In Isa 11 8; 59 5, and Jer 8 17, ARV has "adder," while AV has "cockatrice" and ERV has "basilisk."

(9) שְׁפִיפֹן, shephīphōn, occurs only in Gen 49 17:

> "Dan shall be a serpent [nāḥāsh] in the way,
> An adder [shephīphōn] in the path,
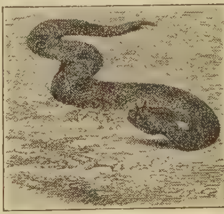
> That biteth the horse's heels,
> So that his rider falleth backward."

This has been thought to be Cerastes cornutus, on the authority of Tristram (NHB), who says that lying in the path it will attack the passer-by, while most snakes will glide away at the approach of a person or large animal. He adds that his horse was much frightened at seeing one of these serpents coiled up in a camel's footprint. The word is perhaps akin to the Arab. سِفّ, siff, or سُفّ, suff, which denotes a spotted and deadly snake.



Adder.

(10) אֶפְעֶה, 'ephʽeh, is found in Job 20 16; Isa 30 6; 59 5, and in EV is uniformly trd "viper." It is the same as the Arab. أَفْعَى, 'afʽa, which is usually trd "viper," though the writer has never found anyone who could tell to what snake the name belongs. In Arab. as in Heb a poisonous snake is always understood.

(11) קִפּוֹז, ḳippōz, ARV "dart-snake," ERV "arrowsnake," AV "great owl," only in Isa 34 15, "There shall the dart-snake make her nest, and lay, and hatch, and gather under her shade; yea, there shall the kites be gathered, every one with her mate." This is the concluding verse in a vivid picture of the desolation of Edom. The renderings "dart-snake" and "arrowsnake" rest on the authority of Bochert, but LXX has ἐχῖνος, echínos, "hedgehog," and Vulg ericeus, "hedgehog." The rendering of AV "great owl" seems preferable to the others, because the words "make her nest, and lay, and hatch, and gather under her shade" are as a whole quite inapplicable to a mammal or to a reptile. The derivation from קָפַז, ḳāphaz (cf Arab. قَفَزَ, ḳāfaz), "to spring," "to dart," suits, it is true, a snake, and not a hedgehog, but may also suit an owl. Finally, the next word in Isa 34 15 is "kites," דַּיּוֹת, dayyōth; cf Arab. حِدَأَة, ḥida'at. See Bittern; Owl; Porcupine.

(12) ὄφις, óphis, a general term for "serpent," occurs in numerous passages of the NT and LXX, and is fairly equivalent to nāḥāsh.

(13) ἀσπίς, aspís, occurs in the NT only in Rom 3 13 ‖ to Ps 140 3. See under (5) 'akhshūbh and (6) pethen. It is found in LXX for these words, and also for 'ephʻeh (Isa 30 6).

(14) ἔχιδ α, échidna, occurs in Acts 28 3, "A viper came out . . . . and fastened on his [Paul's] hand," and 4 t in the expression "offspring [AV "generation"] of vipers," γεννήματα ἐχιδνῶν, gennḗmata echidnōn (Mt 3 7; 12 34; 23 33; Lk 3 7). The allied (masc.?) form ἔχις, échis, occurs in Sir 39 30, RV "adder."

(15) ἑρπετόν, herpetón, "creeping thing," AV "serpent," is found in Jas 3 7.

That the different Heb and Gr names are used without clear distinction is seen from several examples of the employment of two different names in ‖ expressions:

> "Their poison is like the poison of a serpent [nāḥāsh];
> They are like the deaf adder [pethen] that stoppeth her ear" (Ps 58 4).
> "They have sharpened their tongue like a serpent [nāḥāsh]; > Adders' ['akhshūbh] poison is under their lips" (Ps 140 3).
> "For, behold, I will send serpents [nᵉḥāshīm], adders [çiphʻōnīm], among you, which will not be charmed; and they shall bite you, saith Jeh" (Jer 8 17).
> "They shall lick the dust like a serpent [nāḥāsh]; like crawling things of the earth [zōḥălē 'ereç] they shall come trembling out of their close places" (Mic 7 17).
> "He shall suck the poison of asps [pethen]: The viper's ['ephʻeh] tongue shall slay him" (Job 20 16).
> "Their wine is the poison of serpents [tannīnīm], and the cruel venom of asps [pᵉthānīm]" (Dt 32 33).
> "And the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp [pethen], and the weaned child shall put his hand on the adder's [çiphʻōnī] den" (Isa 11 8).

4. Figurative

Most of the Bib. references to serpents are of a figurative nature, and they usually imply poisonous qualities. The wicked (Ps 58 4), the persecutor (Ps 140 3), and the enemy (Jer 8 17) are likened to venomous serpents. The effects of wine are compared to the bites of serpents (Prov 23 32). Satan is a serpent (Gen 3; Rev 12 9; 20 2). The term "offspring of vipers" is applied by John the Baptist to the Pharisees and Sadducees (Mt 3 7) or to the multitudes (Lk 3 7) who came to hear him; and by Jesus to the scribes and Pharisees (Mt 12 34; 23 33). Dan is a "serpent in the way . . . . that biteth the horse's heels" (Gen 49 17). Serpents are among the terrors of the wilderness (Dt 8 15; Isa 30 6). Among the signs accompanying believers is that "they shall take up serpents" (Mk 16 18; cf Acts 28 5). It is said of him that trusts in Jeh:

> "Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder:
> The young lion and the serpent shalt thou trample under foot" (Ps 91 13).

In the millennium, "the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the adder's den" (Isa 11 8). The serpent is subtle (Gen 3 1; 2 Cor 11 3); wise (Mt 10 16); accursed (Gen 3 14); eats dust (Gen 3 14; Isa 65 25; Mic 7 17). The adder is deaf (Ps 58 4). The serpent lurks in unexpected places (Gen 49 17; Eccl 10 8; Am 5 19). Serpents may be charmed (Ps 58 5; Eccl 10 11; Jer 8 17). Among four wonderful things is "the way of a serpent upon a rock" (Prov 30 19). Alfred Ely Day

SERPENT, BRAZEN, brā'z'n. See Nehushtan.

SERPENT-CHARMING, -chärm'ing: Allusion to this art, widely practised by the ancients (see references in DB, s.v.; esp. Bochart, Hieron., III, 161, 164, etc), as by modern Orientals, is found in Ps 58 5; Eccl 10 11; Jer 8 17; Sir 12 13, perhaps in Jas 3 7. The skill displayed in taming snakes, often without removing the poison fangs, is very surprising. Bruce, Davy and other travelers give striking illustrations. See esp. the interesting account of serpent-charming in Hengstenberg's Egypt and the Books of Moses, ET, 100–104.

SERPENT, CROOKED, krŏŏk'ed: With reference to the constellation round the North Pole, in Job 26 13, RV "the swift serpent," m "fleeing"; and Isa 27 1, RVm "winding." In the first part of the latter passage, AV "piercing serpent" is changed in RV to "swift serpent," m "gliding" or "fleeing." See Astronomy, II, 1.

SERPENT, FIERY. See Serpent, 3, (2).

SERPENT WORSHIP, wûr'ship: Traces of this superstition are thought by certain critics to be discoverable in the religion of Israel. Stade mentions that W. R. Smith supposed the serpent to be the totem of the house of David (Geschichte, I, 465). H. P. Smith says: "We know of a Serpent's Stone near Jerus, which was the site of a sanctuary (1 K 1 9), and this sanctuary was dedicated to Jeh" (Hist of OT, 239, 240). Special reliance is placed on the narrative of the brazen serpent, which Hezekiah is recorded to have destroyed as leading to idolatry (2 K 18 4). "In that case," says H. P. Smith, "we must treat the Nehushtan as a veritable idol of the house of Israel, which had been worshipped in the temple from the time of its erection. Serpent worship is so widespread that we should be surprised not to find traces of it in Israel" (ut supra). In the same line, see G. B. Gray, Nu, 275–76. The fancifulness of these deductions is obvious. See Nehushtan. James Orr

SERUG, sē'rug (שְׂרוּג, sᵉrūgh; Σερούχ, Seroúch): Son of Reu and great-grandfather of Abraham (Gen 11 20 ff; 1 Ch 1 26; Lk 3 35).

SERVANT, sûr'vant (עֶבֶד, 'ebhedh; δοῦλος, doúlos): A very common word with a variety of meanings, all implying a greater or less degree of inferiority and want of freedom: (1) The most frequent usage is as the equivalent of "slave" (q.v.), with its various shades in position (Gen 9 25; 24 9; Ex 21 5; Mt 10 24; Lk 17 7, and often); but also a hired workman where "hired servant" translates Heb and Gr expressions which differ from the above. (2) An attendant in the service of someone, as Joshua was the "servant," RV "minister," of Moses (Nu 11 28). (3) As a term of respectful self-depreciation referring to one's self, "thy servant" or "your servant" is used in place of the personal pronoun of the first person: (a) in the presence of superiors (Gen 19 2; 32 18, and often); (b) in addressing the Supreme Being (1 S 3 9; Ps 19 11; 27 9; Lk 2 29, and often). (4) Officials of every grade are called the "servants" of kings, princes, etc (1 S 29 3; 2 S 16 1; 1 K 11 26; Prov 14 35, and often). (5) The position of a king in relation to his people (1 K 12 7). (6) One who is distinguished as obedient and faithful to God or Christ (Josh 1 2; 2 K 8 19; Dnl 6 20; Col 4 12; 2 Tim 2 24). (7) One who is enslaved by sin (Jn 8 34).

1. Historical Situation

A century and a half had passed since the great days of Isaiah in Jerus. The world had vastly changed during those long decades when politicians had planned, armies surged back and forth, and tribes and nations had lost or won in the struggle for existence, place and power. The center of the world had changed—for Assyria had gone to its long home, and the city claiming preeminence was not Nineveh but Babylon.

Nowhere perhaps had time laid a heavier hand than on the city of Jerus and the country of Judah. For city and land had come to desolation, and the inhabitants of the country had become familiar with the strange sights and sounds of Babylonia, whither they had been carried by their conquerors. Many had found graves in the land of the exile, and new generations had arisen who had no memory of the hill country of their fathers. It is the situation of these captive Jews in Babylonia which is reflected and they who are addressed at the waning of the long night of captivity by the stirring message recorded in Isa chs 40–66 (leaving out of account here disputed passages in chs 40–66).

2. Authorship of Isa Chs 40–66

The more one studies the problem of the authorship of these chapters, the more unlikely does it seem that their author penned them 150 years before the time with which they are vitally connected. It is obviously impossible to treat that problem in a detailed way here, but one may sum up the arguments by saying that in theological ideas, in style, and use of words they show such differences from the assured productions of Isaiah's pen as to point to a different authorship. And the great argument, the argument which carries the most weight to the author of this article, is that these late chapters are written from the standpoint of the exile. The exile is assumed in what is said. These chapters do not prophesy the exile, do not say it is to come; they all the time speak as though it had come. The message is not that an exile is to be, but beginning with the fact that the exile already is, it foretells deliverance. Now of course it is conceivable that God might inspire a man to put himself forward 150 years, and with a message to people who were to live then, assuming their circumstances as a background of what he said, but it is improbable to the last degree. To put it in plain, almost gruff, English, it is not the way God did things. The prophet's message was always primarily a message to his own age. Then there is no claim in the chapters themselves that Isaiah was their author. And having once been placed so that it was supposed they were by Isaiah—placed so through causes we do not know—the fact that in speaking of passages from these chapters NT authors referred to them by a name the people would recognize, is not a valid argument that they meant to teach anything as to their authorship. The problem had not arisen in NT times. Isa, chs 40–66, as Professor Davidson has suggested, has a parallel in the Book of Job, each the production of a great mind, each from an author we do not know (cf Isaiah).

3. The Prophet of the Exile

Out of the deep gloom of the exile—when the Jew was a man without a country, when it seemed as if the nation's sins had murdered hope—out of this time comes the voice most full of gladness and abounding hope of all the voices from the OT life. In the midst of the proud, confident civilization of Babylonia, with its teeming wealth and exhaustless splendor, came a man who dared to speak for Jeh—a man of such power to see reality that to him Babylonia was already doomed, and he could summon the people to prepare for God's deliverance.

4. The Unity of Chs 40–66

In recent criticism, esp. in Germany, there has been a strong tendency to assign the last chapters of this section to a different author from the first. The background it is claimed is not Bab; the sins rebuked are the sins of the people when at home in Judaea, and in at least one passage the temple at Jerus seems to be standing. That these chapters present difficulties need not be disputed, but it seems to me that again and again in them one can find the hand of Second Isa. Then undoubtedly the author quotes from previous prophecies which we can recognize, and the suggestion that some of the difficult passages may be quotations from other older prophecies which are not preserved to us, I think an exceedingly good one. The quotation of such passages in view of the prospect of return, and the prophet's feeling of the need of the people, would seem to me not at all unnatural. If a later hand is responsible for some utterances in the latter part of the section, it seems to me fairly clear that most of it is from the hand of the great unknown prophet of the exile.

The questions regarding the Servant-passages as affecting the unity of the book will be treated later.

5. Principal Ideas of Chs 40–66

The first part of this section vividly contrasts Jeh and the idols worshipped with such splendor and ceremony. All the resources of irony and satire are used to give point and effect to the contrast. Cyrus the Median conqueror is already on the horizon, and he is declared to be God's instrument in the deliverance. The idols are described in process of manufacture; they are addressed in scornful apostrophe, they are seen carried away helpless. On the other side Jeh, with illimitable foresight and indomitable strength, knows and reveals the future. They know and reveal nothing. He brings to pass what He has planned. They do nothing. Not only the idols but Babylonia itself is made the victim of satire—and the prophet hurls a taunt song at the proud but impotent city.

Israel—the people of Jeh—the elect of God—is given the prophet's message. The past is called up as a witness to Jeh's dealings. His righteousness—His faithfulness to His people—shall not fail. They are unworthy, but out of His own bounty salvation is provided. And with joy of this salvation from exile and from sin the book rings and rings. The Zion of the restored Israel is pictured with all the play of color and richness of imagery at the prophet's command. And this restored Israel is to have a world-mission. Its light is to fall upon all lands. It is to minister salvation to all races of men.

But back of and under these pictures of great hope is the prophet's sense of his people's sin and their struggle with it. In the latter part of the book, esp. chs 59 and 64 this comes out clearly. And the mood of these chapters expresses the feeling out of which some of the deep things of the Servant-passages came. There is no need to insist that the chapters as they stand are in the order in which they were written. We know from other prophecies that this was not always true. But even if a man were convinced that the chapters now occurring after the Servant-passages were all written after them, he could still hold, and I think would be justified in holding, that in places in those chapters the reader finds the record of a state of the prophet's mind before the writing of those passages. The former view would be, I think, the preferable one. At any rate the point of view is logically that out of which some of the deep things in the Servant-passages came.

In profoundness of meaning the climax of the book is reached in these passages where the deliverance from exile and the deliverance from sin are connected with one great figure—the Servant of Jeh.

6. The Servant-Passages

The word "servant," as applied to servants of God, is not an unfamiliar one to readers of the OT. It is applied to different individuals and by Jeremiah to the nation (cf Jer 30 10; 46 27); but its message is on the whole so distinct and complete in Second Isa that we can study it without any further reference to previous usage.

The "servant" first appears in Isa 41 8. Here the reference is undoubtedly to Israel, chosen and called of God and to be upheld by Him. Here Israel is promised victory over its enemies. In vivid picture their destruction and Israel's future trust and glory in God are portrayed.

There are several incidental references to Israel as Jeh's servant: created by Jeh and not to be forgotten (41 8); Cyrus is said to be called for the sake of His servant Jacob (45 4); Jeh is said to have redeemed His servant Jacob (48 20).

In 44 26 "servant" seems to be used with the meaning of prophet. It is said of Jeh that He "confirmeth the word of his servant, and performeth the counsel of his messengers."

In 42 19 we find the failure and inadequacy of Israel presented in the words, "Who is blind, but my servant? or deaf, as my messenger that I send?" This passage is an explanation of the exile. Israel proved unworthy and sinned, hence its punishment, but even in the exile the lesson had not been taken to heart.

In 43 8 ff Jeh summons Israel the servant, who in spite of blindness and deafness yet is His witness. It has at least seen enough to be able to witness for Him in the presence of the heathen.

In 44 1–5, leaving the unworthiness of the actual Israel, there comes what seems to me a summons in the name of the possible, the ideal. The underlying thought is a call to the high future which God has ready to give.

This covers the reference to the servant outside the great Servant-passages to which we now come. There are four of these: 42 1–9; 49 1–9*a;* 50 4–11; 52 13—53 12. 61 1–4 perhaps represents words of the Servant, but may refer to words of the prophet, and, as at any rate it adds no new features to the picture of the Servant already given in the passages undoubtedly referring to him, we will not discuss it.

(1) Date of the Servant-passages.—Ewald long ago suggested that the last of the Servant-passages must have been borrowed from an earlier composition, which he assigned to the age of Manasseh. "If we find in the study of the passage reason for its vividness, we shall not need to seek its origin in the description of some past martyrdom."

Duhm quoted by Cheyne thinks the Servant-passages post-exilic. The gentleness and quiet activity of the Servant for one thing, according to Duhm, suggest the age of the scribes, rather than that of the exile. But might not an age of suffering be a time to learn the lesson of gentleness? According to Skinner, Duhm thinks the passages were inserted almost haphazard, but Skinner also refers to Kosters, showing that the passages cannot be lifted without carrying some of the succeeding verses with them. This is particularly significant in view of the recent popularity of other theories which deny the Servant-passages to the hand and time of Second Isa. The theory that these passages form by themselves a poem or a set of poems which have been inserted here can boast of distinguished names.

There does not seem much to commend it, however. As to the argument from difference as to rhythm, there is disagreement, and the data are probably not of a sort to warrant much significance being applied to it either way. The fact that the passages are not always a part of a connected movement of thought would play great havoc if made a universal principle of discrimination as to authorship in the prophecies of the OT. If we succeed in giving the fundamental ideas of the passages a place in relation to the thought of Deutero-Isa, an argument for which cogency might be claimed will be dissipated. But even at its best this argument would not be conclusive. To deny certain ideas to an author simply because he has not expressed them in a certain bit of writing acknowledged to him is perilous business. A message of hope surely does not preclude an appreciation of the dark things.

The truth of the matter is that even by great scholars the temptation to a criticism of knight-errantry is not always resisted. And I think we shall not make any mistake in believing that this is the case with the attempt to throw doubt upon the Deutero-Isaianic authorship of the Servant-passages.

(2) Discussion of the passages.—42 1–9: In these verses Jeh Himself is the speaker, describing the Servant as His chosen, in whom His soul delights, upon whom He has put His spirit. He is to bring justice to the Gentiles. His methods are to be quiet and gentle, and the very forlorn hope of goodness He will not quench. He is to set justice in the earth, and remote countries are described as waiting for His law. Then comes a declaration by the prophet that Jeh, the Creator of all, is the speaker of words declaring the Servant's call in righteousness to be a covenant for the people, a light to the Gentiles, a helper to those in need—the blind and imprisoned. Jeh's glory is not to be given to another, nor His praise to graven images. Former prophecies have come to pass. New things He now declares. One's attention needs to be called to the distinction of the Servant from Israel in this passage. He is to be a covenant of the people: according to Delitzsch, "he in whom and through whom Jeh makes a new covenant with His people in place of the old one that has been broken."

49 1–9*a;* Here the Servant himself speaks, telling of his calling from the beginning of his life, of the might of his word, of his shelter in God, of a time of discouragement in which he thought his labor in vain, followed by insistence on his trust in God. Then Jeh promises him a larger mission than the restoration of Israel, viz. to be a light to the Gentiles. Jeh speaks of the Servant as one despised, yet to be triumphant so that he will be honored by kings and princes. He is to lead his people forth at their restoration, "to make them inherit the desolate heritages; saying to them that are bound, Go forth; to them that are in darkness, Show yourselves."

Clearly the Servant is distinct from the people Israel in this passage. Yet in ver 3 he is addressed as Israel. The word Israel here may be a gloss, which would solve the difficulty, or the Servant may be addressed as Israel because he gathers up in himself the meaning of the ideal Israel. If it is true that the prophet gradually passed from the conception of Israel as a nation to a person through whom its true destiny would be realized, this last suggestion would gain in probability.

One notices here the emphasis on the might of the Servant, and in this passage we come to understand that he is to pass through a time of ignominy. The phrase "a servant of rulers" is a difficult one, which would be clear if the prophet conceived of him as one of the exiles, and typically representing them. The Servant's mission in this passage seems quite bound up with the restoration.

50 4–11: In the first part of this passage the Servant is not mentioned directly, but it seems clear that he is speaking. He is taught of God continually, that he may bring a message to the weary. He has opened his ear so that he may fully understand Jeh's message. The Servant now describes his sufferings as coming to him because of his obedience. He was not rebellious and did not turn back from his mission. Flint-like he set his face and with confidence in God met the shame which came upon him. After language vivid with a sense of ignominy his assured consciousness of victory and faith in God are expressed.

In vs 10–11, according to Delitzsch, Jeh speaks, first encouraging those who listen to the Servant, then addressing those who despise his word. Cheyne thinks the Servant mentioned in ver 10 may be the prophet, but I prefer Delitzsch's view.

52 13—53 12: The present division of 52 13—53 12 is unfortunate, for obviously it is all of a piece and ought to stand together in one chapter.

In 52 13–15 Jeh speaks of the humiliation and later of the exaltation of the Servant. He shall deal wisely—the idea here including the success resulting from wisdom—and shall be exalted. Words are piled upon each other here to express his exaltation. But the appearance of the Servant is such as to suggest the very opposite of his dignity, which will astonish nations and kings when they come to understand it.

Entering upon ch 53 we find the people of Israel speaking confessing their former unbelief, and giving as a reason the repulsive aspect of the Servant—despised, sad, sick with a visage to make men turn from him. He is described as though he had been a leper. They thought all this had come upon him as a stroke from God, but they now see how he went even to death, not for his own transgression but for theirs. Their peace and healing came through his suffering and death. They have been sinful and erring; the result of it all God has caused to light upon him.

They look back in wonder at the way he bore his sufferings—like a lamb led to the slaughter; with a false judicial procedure he was led away, no one considering his death, or its relation to them. His grave even was an evidence of ignominy.

Beginning at ver 10 the people cease speaking, according to Delitzsch, and the prophecy becomes the organ of God who acknowledges His Servant. The reference to a trespass offering in ver 10 is remarkable. Nowhere else is prophecy so connected with the sacrificial system (A.B. Davidson). It pleased God to bruise the Servant—his soul having been made a trespass offering; the time of humiliation over, the time of exaltation will come.

By his knowledge we are told—here a momentary reversion to the time of humiliation taking place—by his knowledge he shall justify many and bear their iniquities. Then comes the exaltation—dividing of spoils and greatness—the phrases suggesting kingly glory: all this is to be his because of his suffering. The great fact of ch 53 is vicarious suffering.

(3) Whom did the prophet mean by the Servant?—(a) Obviously not all of Israel always, for the Servant is distinguished from Israel. (b) Not the godly remnant, for he is distinguished from them. Then the godly remnant does not attain to any such proportions as to fit the description of ch 53. (c) And one cannot accept the theory that the prophetic order is intended. The whole order is not great enough to exhaust the meaning of one of a half-dozen of the greatest lines in ch 53.

Professor A. B. Davidson's OT Prophecy contains a brilliant and exceedingly able discussion of the question which he approaches from the standpoint of Bib. rather than simply exegetical theology. His fundamental position is that in the prophet's outlook the restoration is the consummation. In his mind the Servant and his work cannot come after the restoration. The Servant, if a real person, must be one whose work lies in the past or the present, as there is not room in the future for him, for the restoration which is at the door brings felicity, and after that no sufferings of the Servant are conceivable. But there is no actual person in the past and none in the present who could be the Servant. Hence the Servant cannot be to the prophet's mind a real person (see Coniah).

Of course Davidson relates the result to his larger conception of prophecy in such a way as to secure the Messianic significance of the passages in relation to their fulfilment in Our Lord. The ideas they contain are realized in Him.

But coming back to the prophet's mind—if the Servant was not a person to him, what significance did he have? The answer according to Davidson is, He is a great personification of the ideal Israel. "He is Israel according to its idea." To quote more fully, "The prophet has created out of the Divine determinations imposed on Israel, election, creation and forming, endowment with the word or spirit of Jeh, and the Divine purpose in these operations, an ideal Being, an inner Israel in the heart of the phenomenal or actual Israel, an indestructible Being having these Divine attributes or endowments, present in the outward Israel in all ages, powerful and effectual because really composed, if I can say so, of Divine forces, who cannot fail in God's purpose, and who as an inner power within Israel by his operation causes all Israel to become a true servant" (cf Davidson, OT Prophecy, 435–36).

Now it seems to me that Davidson is more effective in his destructive than in his constructive work. One must confess that he presents real difficulties in the way of holding to a personal Servant as the prophet's conception. But on the other hand when he tries to replace that by a more adequate conception, I do not think he conspicuously succeeds.

The greatest of the Servant-passages (it seems to me) presents more than can be successfully dealt with under the conception of the Servant as the ideal Israel. The very great emphasis on vicarious suffering in ch 53 simply is not answered by the theory. Words would not leap with such a flame of reality in describing the suffering of a personification. The sense of sin back of the passage is not a thing whose problem could be solved by a glittering figure of speech. There it surges—the movement of an aroused conscience—and the answer to it could never be anything less than a real deed by a real person. My own feeling is that if language can express anything it expresses the fact that the prophet had a real personal Servant in view.

But what of the difficulties Davidson suggests? Even if the answer were not easy to find, one could rest on the total impression the passages make. One cannot vaporize a passage for the sake of placing it in an environment in which one believes it belongs. As Cheyne in other days said, "In the sublimest descriptions of the Servant I am unable to resist the impression that we have the presentment of an individual, and venture to think that our general view of the Servant ought to be ruled by those passages in which the enthusiasm of the author is at its height."

The first thing we need to remember in dealing with the difficulties Davidson has brought forth is the timelessness of prophecy, and the resulting fact that every prophet saw the future as if lying just on the horizon of his own time. As prophets saw the day of Jeh as if at hand, so it seems to me Deutero-Isaiah saw the Servant: each really afar off, yet each really seen in the colors of the present. Then we must remember that the prophets did not relate all their conceptions. They stated truths whose meaning and articulation they did not understand. They were not philosophers with a Hegelian hunger for a total view of life, and when we try to read them from this standpoint we misjudge them. Then we must remember that the prophet may here have been lifted to a height of prophetic receptiveness where he received and uttered what went beyond the limits of his own understanding. To be sure there was a point of contact, but I see no objection to the thought that in a place of unique significance and importance like this, God might use a man to utter words which reached far beyond the limits of his own understanding. In this connection some words of Professor Hermann Schultz are worth quoting: "If it is true anywhere in the history of poetry and prophecy, it is true here that the writer being full of the spirit has said more than he himself meant to say and more than he himself understood."

(4) The psychology of the prophecy.—This does not mean that something may not be said about the connection of the Servant-passages with the prophet's own thought. Using Delitzsch's illustration, we can see how from regarding all Israel as the servant the prophet could narrow down to the godly part of Israel as experience taught him the faithlessness of many, and it ought not to be impossible for us to see how all that Israel really meant at its best could have focused itself in his thought upon one person. Despite Davidson's objection, I can see nothing artificial about this movement in the prophet's mind. There was probably more progression in his thought than Professor Davidson is willing to allow. If it is asked, Where was the person to whom the prophet could ascribe such greatness, conceiving as he did that he was to come at once? surely a similar question would be fair in relation to Isaiah's Messiah. The truth is that even on the threshold of the restoration there was time for a great one suddenly to arise. As John the Baptist on the Jordan watched for the coming One whom he knew not, yet who was alive, so the great prophet of the exile may have watched even day by day for the coming Servant whose work had been revealed to him.

But deep in the psychology of the prophecy is the sense of sin out of which these passages came and indications of which I think are found in the latter part of the book. The great guilt-laden past lay terribly behind the prophet, and as he mused over the sufferings of the righteous, perhaps esp. drawn to the heart-rent Jeremiah, the thought of redemptive suffering may have dawned upon him. And if in its light, and with a personal sense of sin drawn from what experiences we know not, he grapples with the problem, can we not understand, can we not see that God might flash upon him the great conception of a sin-bearer?

7. Place of the Servant-Passages in OT Prophecy

At last the idea of vicarious suffering had been connected with the deep things of the nation's life, and henceforward was a part of its heritage. To the profoundest souls it would be a part of the nation's forward look. The priestly idea had been deepened and filled with new moral meaning. The Servant was a prophet too—so priest and prophet met in one. And I think Cheyne was right when he suggested that in the Servant's exaltation in ch 53, the idea of the Servant is brought nearer to that of king than we sometimes think. So in suggestion, at least, prophet, priest and king meet in the great figure of the suffering Servant.

A new rich stream had entered into prophecy, full of power to fertilize whatever shores of thought it touched. In the thoughts of these passages prophecy seemed pressing with impatient eagerness to its goal, and though centuries were to pass before that goal was reached, its promise is seen here, full of assurance and of knowledge of the kind of goal it is to be.

8. Larger Messianic Significance of the Servant-Passages

But whatever our view of the meaning of the prophet, we must agree (cf Mt 8 17; 12 18–21; 26 67; Jn 12 41, et al.) that the conception he so boldly and powerfully put upon his canvas had its realization, its fulfilment in the One who spoke to the world from the cross on Calvary. And in its darkly glorious shadow the Christian, with all the sadness and joy and wonder of it, with a sense of its solving all his problems and meeting the deepest needs and outreaches of his life, can feel a strange companionship with the exilic prophet whose yearning for a sin-bearer and belief in His coming call across the long and slowly moving years. In the light and penetration of that hour he may be trusted to know what the prophet meant. Professor Delitzsch well said of that passage, "Every word is as it were written under the cross at Golgotha."

SERVANTS, SOLOMON'S. See Solomon's Servants.

SERVICE, sûr′vis: Six Heb, two Aram. and four Gr words are so rendered.

1. In the OT

In the OT the word most used for "service" is (1) ʽ*ăbhōdhāh,* from ʽ*ābhadh,* which is the general word, meaning "to work" and so "to serve," "to till," also "to enslave." The noun means "bondage," "labor," "ministering," "service," "tillage," "work," "use." The word is used in describing work in the fields (Ex 1 14, et al.), work in the tabernacle (Ex 27 19, et al.), sanctuary service (Nu 7 9), service of Jeh (Nu 8 11), Levitical or priestly service (Nu 8 22), kingly service (1 Ch 26 30), etc. Reference is made to instruments, wood vessels, cattle, herbs, shekels for the service in the house of Jeh. (2) ʽ*Ābhadh* itself is trᵈ "service" in Nu 8 15; 18 23; Jer 22 13. (3) Serādh means "stitching," i.e. piercing with a needle; it occurs only 4 t, and in each case in RV instead of "service" is trᵈ "finely wrought garments" (Ex 31 10; 35 19; 39 1.41). (4) Shārath means primarily "to attend" as a servant or worshipper, and to contribute to or render service, wait on, and thence service; occurs only 3 t (Ex 35 19; 39 1.41 AV) and in ARV is rendered "for ministering." (5) Çābhā' is found 7 t, used in the same connection each time, and refers to those numbered for service in the tent of meeting. Its primary root meaning refers to service for war, campaign, hardship (Nu 4 30.35.39.43; 8 24). (6) Yādh means lit. an "open hand," indicating direction, power, and so ministry as in 1 Ch 6 31, where David appoints certain ones to have direction of the music, trᵈ in 1 Ch 29 5, RV not service, but "himself." (7) ʽ*Ăbhīdhāh* means "business," "labor," "affairs"; Ezr 6 18 is the only place where it is found. (8) Polḥān, from root meaning "to worship," "minister to," and so in Ezr 7 19 vessels given for service.

2. In the NT

The following are the uses in the NT: (1) Diakonía, from root meaning "to run on errands," and so attendance, aid as a servant, ministry, relief, and hence service; cf Eng. word "deacon"; Paul: "that I might minister unto you" (2 Cor 11 8); also found in Rom 15 31 ("ministration") and Rev 2 19 ("ministry"). (2) Douleúō, lit. "to be a slave," in bondage, service (Gal 4 8, "bondage"; Eph 6 7, "service"; 1 Tim 6 2, "serve"). (3) Latreía, from root meaning "to render religious homage," menial service to God, and so worship (Jn 16 2, "service"; Rom 9 4, "service"; Rom 12 1, "spiritual service"; He 9 1, "service"; 9 6, "services"). (4) Leitourgía, from root "to perform religious or charitable functions," worship, relieve, obey, minister, and hence a public function, priestly or charitable (liturgy) (2 Cor 9 12, "service"; also in Phil 2 17.30). See Servant.

SERVITUDE, sûr′vi-tūd. See Servant; Slave.

SESIS, sē′sis (B, Σεσείς, Seseís, A, Σεσσείς, Sesseís): One who put away his foreign wife (1 Esd 9 34) = "Shashai" in Ezr 10 40.

SESTHEL, ses′thel (Σεσθήλ, Sesthḗl): One of the sons of Addi who put away their foreign wives (1 Esd 9 31) = "Bezalel" in Ezr 10 30.

SET: Few words in the Eng. language have such a rich variety of meaning and are used in so rich a variety of idiomatic expression as the word "set." A glance at any of the great dicts. will convince anyone of the truth of this statement. The Standard Dictionary devotes three and a half columns to the word. In its primary meaning it there denotes 22 distinct things, in its secondary meaning 17 more, while 18 distinct phrases are given in which it is used, in some cases again in a variety of meanings. It is indeed a word calculated to drive a foreigner to despair. Some 70 Heb and about 30 Gr words in the original tongues of the Holy Scriptures have been rendered by the word "set," in AV and also in RV. A careful comparative study of the original and of tr^{s} in other tongues will at once indicate that a lack of discrimination is evident on the part of the Eng. translators in the frequent use of the word "set."

Thus in Cant 5 14, "hands are as rings of gold set with beryl," the Heb word is מָלֵא, mālē', "to be filled," "full." Vulg translates plenae, the Dutch gevuld, the Ger. voll; Prov 8 27, "when he set a circle," Heb חָקַק, ḥāḳaḳ, "to describe," "decree," Vulg vallabat, Dutch beschreef; Ezr 4 10, "set in the city of Samaria," Aram. יְתִב, y^{e}thibh, "to cause to sit down," "to cause to dwell," Vulg habitare eas fecit, Dutch doen wonen; Ps 2 6, "Yet have I set my king upon my holy hill," Heb נָסַךְ, nāṣakh, "to pour out," "to anoint," Dutch gezalfd; Isa 19 2, AV "I will set the Egyptians against the Egyptians," Heb סָכַךְ, ṣākhakh, "to disturb," "to confuse," Vulg concurrere faciam, Dutch verwarren, Ger. an einander setzen; Rev 3 8, "I have set before thee a door," Gr δίδωμι, dídōmi, "to give," Vulg dedi coram te, Dutch gegeven, Ger. gegeben; Acts 19 27, AV "Our craft is in danger to be set at nought," Gr ἔρχομαι, érchomai, "to come," Vulg periclitabitur, Dutch in verachting komen; Lk 4 18, "to set at liberty them," Gr ἀποστέλλω. apostéllō, "to send away," Dutch heen te zenden in vrijheid; Acts 13 9, AV "Saul . . . . set his eyes on him," Gr ἀτενίζω, atenízō, "to stare fixedly," Vulg intuens in eum, Dutch de oogen op hem houdende. These are but a few examples chosen at random where our Eng. translators have rendered Heb and Gr words by "set," where a more literal tr, in equally good idiomatic language, was possible. The word "set" is the causative of "sit," and indicates primarily a power of self-support, in opposition to the idea of the word "lay."

(1) In its primary meaning the word "set" is used in our Eng. Bible in many senses: (a) Foundation: Cant 5 15, "His legs are as pillars of marble set upon." (b) Direction: Ezk 21 16, "whithersoever thy face is set." (c) Appointed time: Acts 12 21, "upon a set day." (d) Fixed place: 2 Ch 20 17, "Set yourselves, stand ye still, and see"; 2 S 6 17; Mt 4 5. (e) Cause to sit: 1 S 2 8, AV "to set them among princes"; 2 Ch 23 20; Ps 68 6. (f) Appointment: Ezr 7 25, AV "set magistrates and judges"; Gen 41 41; 1 S 12 13; Ps 2 6; Dnl 1 11. (g) To lift up: Gen 31 17, "set his sons and his wives upon." (h) Appointed place: Gen 1 17, "God set them in the firmament." (i) Cause to stand: Gen 47 7, "Joseph brought in Jacob . . . . and set him before Pharaoh"; Nu 8 13; 2 Ch 29 25. (j) Sitting: Mt 5 1, AV "when he was set"; He 8 1 AV. (k) Location: Mt 5 14, "a city set on a hill." These by no means exhaust the meaning which the word, in its primary sense, has in our Eng. Bible.

(2) In a secondary or tropical sense it is used with equal frequency, usually with various prepositions. Thus (a) To attack: Jgs 9 33, AV "and set upon the city." (b) To imprint: Gen 4 15, AV "The Lord set a mark upon Cain." (c) To direct to: 1 K 2 15, "And that all Israel set their faces on me." (d) To place: 1 K 20 12, Ben-hadad shouted one word to his allies: "Set," i.e. set the armies in array, the battering-rams and engines of attack in their place. (e) To incline toward: Ezk 40 4, "Set thy heart upon all that I shall show." (f) To trust in: Ps 62 10, "If riches increase, set not your heart thereon." (g) To place before: Ps 90 8, "Thou hast set our iniquities before"; Ps 141 3, "Set a watch, O Jeh, before my mouth." (h) To go down: of the setting of the sun (Mk 1 32; Lk 4 40). (i) To be proud: Mal 3 15, AV "They that work wickedness are set up." (j) To fill in: Ex 35 9, "stones to be set, for the ephod." (k) To plant: Mk 12 1, "set a hedge about it." (l) To mock: Lk 23 11, "Herod . . . . set him at nought." (m) To honor: 1 S 18 30, "so that his name was much set by." (n) To start: Acts 21 2, "We went aboard, and set sail." As may be seen the word is used in an endless variety of meanings. Henry E. Dosker

SETH, seth, SHETH, sheth (שֵׁת, shēth; Σήθ, Sḗth):

(1) The son born to Adam and Eve after the death of Abel (Gen 4 25 f; 5 3 ff; 1 Ch 1 1; Sir 49 16; Lk 3 38). In Gen 4 25 the derivation of the name is given. Eve "called his name Seth: For, said she, God hath appointed [shāth] me another seed instead of Abel." In 1 Ch 1 1 AV, the form is "Sheth"; elsewhere in AV and in RV throughout the form is "Seth."

(2) AV "the children of Sheth," RV "the sons of tumult." According to AV rendering, the name of an unknown race mentioned in Balaam's parable (Nu 24 17). S. F. Hunter

SETHUR, sē′thur (סְתוּר, ṣ^{e}thūr; Σαθούρ, Sathoúr): An Asherite spy (Nu 13 13 [14]).

SETTING, set′ing (מִלֻּאָה, millu'āh, lit. "a filling"): The word is used in the description of the manufacture of the breastplate of judgment (Ex 28 17). The instruction runs: "Thou shalt set in it settings of stones," viz. four rows of precious stones. The same word is rendered "inclosings" in ver 20, and in 39 13 AV.

SETTLE, set′′l (עֲזָרָה, 'ăzārāh): For this word in Ezk 43 14.17.20; 45 19, ARV and ERVm substitute more correctly "ledge." See Temple.

SETTLE: The Heb language has 8 words which are thus tr^{d}: yāshabh, nāḥath, 'āmadh, shāḳaṭ, tābha', nāçabh, māḳōm, ḳāphā'. Now the meaning is to settle down, to cause to occur (Ezk 36 11 AV; 1 Ch 17 14); then it denotes fixedness (2 K 8 11; Ps 119 89; Prov 8 25); again it points to a condition of absolute quiescence, as the settlings on the lees (Jer 48 11); and in still another place it means packing solidly together (Ps 65 10). In the NT the words ἑδραῖος, hedraíos, θεμελιόω, themelióō, and τίθημι, títhēmi, have been tr^{d} "settle." RV in 1 Pet 5 10 has tr^{d} "establish," and the context unquestionably points to the idea of a fixed establishment in the faith. In Lk 21 14 the word tr^{d} "settle" evidently points to a fixed determination. Henry E. Dosker

SEVEN CHURCHES. See Churches, Seven.

SEVEN STARS. See Astronomy.

SEVENEH, sḗ-ven′e, se-vē′ne (סְוֵנֵה, ṣ^{e}wēnēh): For AV "the tower of Syene," in Ezk 29 10; 30 6, RV reads, "the tower of Seveneh," with note m, "or, from Migdol to Syene." Seveneh is the town at the First Cataract in Egypt, now known as Assuan. Fresh interest has recently been given to it by the Elephantine discoveries bearing on the ancient Jewish colony and temple of Jeh in that place in the 5th cent. BC. See ARAMAIC; EGYPT; PAPYRI; SANCTUARY, 4, etc.

SEVENTH, sev″nth, DAY. See SABBATH.

SEVENTY, sev″n-ti (שִׁבְעִים, shibhʽīm; ἑβδομήκοντα, hebdomḗkonta). See NUMBER.

SEVENTY DISCIPLES: The account of the designation and mission of these is found only in Lk 10. Some have therefore sought to maintain that we have here only a confused variant of the appointment of the Twelve; but this is impossible in the light of Luke's account of the Twelve in ch 9.

The documents vary as between the numbers seventy and seventy-two, so that it is impossible to determine which is the correct reading; and internal evidence does not help at all in this case. There is nothing in the function or circumstances to indicate any reason for the specific number.

Commentators have sought parallels in the seventy elders chosen to assist Moses (Nu 11) and suppose that Jesus was incidentally indicating Himself as the "prophet like unto Moses" whom God would raise up.

Again, the Jews popularly reckoned the "number of the nations of the earth" at seventy (cf Gen 10), and some have supposed Jesus to be thus indicating that His gospel is universal. Attention is called to the fact that the Seventy are not forbidden to go to Gentiles and that their commission probably included Peraea, where many Gentiles were to be found. Some, again, have supposed that Jesus had in mind the Jewish Sanhedrin, composed of seventy (or seventy-two), and that the appointment of a like number to extend the work of His kingdom was a parabolic recognition that as the Jews were officially rejecting Him, so He was rejecting them as agents for the work of the kingdom. It is impossible to speak with any certainty as to any of these suggestions. It is to be noted that there is the same confusion between the numbers seventy and seventy-two in all four instances, as also in the tradition as to the number of translators of the LXX.

Inasmuch as no further mention is made of these workers, it is to be understood that they were appointed for a temporary ministry. Tradition names several of them and identifies them with disciples active after Pentecost. While it is probable that some of these were witnesses later, the tradition is worthless in details. The mission of these and the reason assigned for their appointment are essentially the same as in the case of the Twelve. Jesus is now completing His last popular campaign in preaching and introducing the kingdom of heaven. The employing of these in this service is in line with the permanent ideal of Christianity, which makes no distinction between the "laymen" and the "clergy" in responsibility and service. Jesus was perhaps employing all whose experience and sympathy made them fit for work in the harvest that was so plenteous while the laborers were few. He found seventy such now as He would find a hundred and twenty such after His ascension (Acts 1 15). WILLIAM OWEN CARVER

SEVENTY WEEKS: The "seventy weeks" of the prophecy in Dnl 9 24–27 have long been a subject of controversy in the critical schools. The conflicting views may be seen very fully in Dr. Driver's Dnl, 94 ff, 143 ff, and Dr. Pusey's Daniel the Prophet, lects II, III, IV. On both sides it is agreed that the "weeks" in this prophecy are to be interpreted as "weeks of years," i.e. the 70 weeks represent 490 years. This period, commencing with "the going forth of the commandments to restore and build Jerus" (ver 25), is divided into three parts, 7 weeks (49 years), 62 weeks (434 years), and one week (7 years). The 69 weeks extend to the appearance of "an anointed one [Heb "Messiah"], the prince" (ver 25), who, after the 62 weeks, shall be "cut off" (ver 26), apparently in the "midst" of the 70th week (ver 27). On the traditional view (see Pusey), the 69 weeks (483 years) mark the interval from the decree to rebuild Jerus till the appearance of Christ; and if, with Pusey, the decree in question be taken to be that of the 7th year of Artaxerxes (457–56 BC; the mission of Ezra; cf Ezr 7 8 ff), confirmed and extended in the 20th year of the same king (mission of Nehemiah; cf Neh 2 1 ff), the 483 years run out about 27–28 AD, when Our Lord's public ministry began. On the other hand, the view which supposes that the Book of Dnl belongs wholly to the Maccabean age, and does not here contain genuine prediction, is under the necessity of making the 490 years terminate with the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes (171–164 BC), and this, it is admitted, cannot be done. To give time the violent expedient is adopted of dating the commencement of the 70 weeks from the prophecy of Jeremiah of the 70 years' captivity, or of the rebuilding of Jerus (606 or 587 BC), i.e. before the captivity had begun. Even this, as Dr. Driver admits (p. 146), leaves us in 171 BC, some 67 years short of the duration of the 62 weeks, and a huge blunder of the writer of Dnl has to be assumed. The divergent reckonings are legion, and are mutually contradictory (see table in Pusey, p. 217). To invalidate the older view Dr. Driver avails himself of the altered renderings of vs 25 and 27 in ERV. It is to be noted, however, that ARV does not follow ERV in these changes. Thus, whereas ERV reads in ver 25, "Unto the anointed one, the prince, shall be seven weeks: and threescore and two weeks, it shall be built again," and accordingly takes "the anointed one" of ver 26 to be a distinct person, ARV (as also ERVm) reads, as in AV, "shall be seven weeks, and threescore and two weeks." Again, where ERV reads in ver 27 "For the half of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease," ARV (and ERVm) has as formerly, "In the midst of the week he shall cause" etc (conversely, in ver 25 ARVm gives the ERV rendering). The question cannot be discussed here, but it is believed that the traditional interpretation may yet claim acceptance from those who do not accept the postulates of the newer critical writers. See DANIEL; JUBILEES, BOOK OF.
JAMES ORR

SEVENTY YEARS: The period assigned by Jeremiah for the duration of the Jewish exile in Babylon (Jer 25 11.12; 29 10; cf 2 Ch 36 21 f; Ezr 1 1; Dnl 9 2). If the period be reckoned from the date of the first deportation in the 4th year of Jehoiakim (2 K 24 1; 2 Ch 36 6 ff; Dnl 1 1 by another reckoning calls it the 3d year), i.e. 606 BC, till the decree of Cyrus, 536 BC, the prediction was fulfilled to a year. See CAPTIVITY.

SEVER, sev′ẽr: The three Heb words bādhal, pālāh and pāradh are thus tr^d. The idea conveyed is that of setting apart (Lev 20 26 AV) or of setting someone or something apart in a miraculous way (Ex 8 22; 9 4 AV, ERV), or, again, of simple separation on one's own volition (Jgs 4 11 AV, ERV). The Gr word ἀφορίζω, aphorízō (Mt 13 49) stands for final judicial segregation.

SEVERAL, sev′ẽr-al, SEVERALLY, sev′ẽr-al-i: The Heb words ḥophshūth and ḥophshīth, tr^d "several" in AV, ERV, 2 K 15 5; 2 Ch 26 21, are in both cases tr^d "separate" in ARV, and indicate ceremonial uncleanness and consequent severance on account of leprosy. In the parable of the Talents (Mt 25 15) and also in 1 Cor 12 11 the word ἴδιος, ídios, is tr^d "several," "severally." In both cases it points to the individuality of the recipients of the gift bestowed.

SHAALABBIN, shā-a-lab′in (שַׁעֲלַבִּין, sha'ălab-bīn; B, Σαλαβείν, Salabeín, A, Σαλαμείν, Salameín): A town in the territory of Dan named between Ir-shemesh and Aijalon (Josh 19 42). It seems to be identical with Shaalbim.

SHAALBIM, shȧ-al′bim (שַׁעַלְבִּים, sha'albīm; B, Βηθαλαμεί, Bēthalameí, A, Σαλαβείμ, Salabeím, in Josh BA, Θαλαβείμ, Thalabeím): When the Amorites had forced the children of Dan into the mountain they came and dwelt in Mt. Heres, Aijalon and Shaalbim, where, it appears, they were made tributary to the house of Joseph (Jgs 1 35). In the time of Solomon it was included in the administrative district presided over by Ben-deker, along with Makaz, Beth-shemesh and Elon-beth-hanan (1 K 4 9). Beth-shemesh is the same as Ir-shemesh (Josh 19 42). Shaalbim is probably only another name of Shaalabbin. One of David's mighty men is called Eliahba the Shaalbonite. This presumes the existence of a town called Shaalbon (2 S 23 32; 1 Ch 11 33), which again is probably identical with Shaalbim. Onom identifies it with Salaba, a large village in the district of Sebaste (Samaria), which apparently Eusebius and Jerome thought to be in the territory of Dan. It seems, however, too far to the N. Jerome in his comm. on Ezk 48 speaks of the towers of Aijalon and Selebi and Emmaus. Conder would identify Selebi with Selbīt, 3 miles N.W. of Aijalon (Yālo), and 8 miles N. of Beth-shemesh. This would suit for Shaalbim, as far as position is concerned; but it is difficult to account for the heavy ṭ in the name, if derived from Shaalbim.

W. Ewing

SHAALBONITE, shā-al-bō′nīt, shā-al′bȯ-nīt (הַשַּׁעַלְבֹנִי, ha-sha'albōnī; ὁ Σαλαβωνείτης, ho Salabōneítēs [2 S 23 32], B, ὁ 'Ομεί, ho Homeí, A, ὁ Σαλαβωνί, ho Salabōní): Eliahba, one of David's heroes, a native of Shaalbon. See Shaalbim.

SHAALIM, shā′a-lim, LAND OF (אֶרֶץ שַׁעֲלִים, 'ereç sha'ălīm; B, τῆς γῆς 'Εασακέμ, tḗs gḗs Easakém, A, τῆς γῆς Σααλείμ, tḗs gḗs Saaleím; AV Shalim): Saul in search of his father's asses passed through Mt. Ephraim and the land of Shalishah, then through the land of Shaalim and the land of y^{e}mīnī. This last name EV renders "Benjamin" (1 S 9 4). The whole passage is so obscure that no certain conclusions can be reached. The search party may have proceeded northward from Gibeah, through the uplands of Ephraim, turning then westward, then southward, and finally eastward. We should thus look for the land of Shalishah and the land of Shaalim on the west side of the mountain range: and the latter may have been on the slopes to the E. of Lydda. Possibly we ought here to read "Shaalbim," instead of "Shaalim." W. Ewing

SHAAPH, shā′af (שַׁעַף, sha'aph):

(1) A son of Jahdai (1 Ch 2 47).

(2) The son of Maachah, a concubine of Caleb, the brother of Jerahmeel. Shaaph is called the "father," or founder, of the city Madmannah (1 Ch 2 48 f).

SHAARAIM, shā-a-rā′im (שַׁעֲרַיִם, sha'ărayim, "two gates"; Σακαρείμ, Sakareím; AV Sharaim):

(1) A city in the Shephelah or "lowland" of Judah mentioned (Josh 15 36) in close association with Socoh and Azekah; the vanquished army of the Philis passed a Shaaraim in their flight from Socoh toward Gath and Ekron (1 S 17 52). It is possible that in this latter reference the "two gates" may refer—as LXX implies—to the two Phili strongholds themselves. Shaaraim has been identified with Tell Zakarīya (see however Azekah) and with Kh. Sa'īreh (PEF, III, 124, Sh XVII), an old site W. of Beit 'Atāb. Both proposals are hazardous.

(2) One of the towns of Simeon (1 Ch 4 31), called (Josh 19 6) "Sharuhen" and, as one of the uttermost cities of Judah, called (Josh 15 32) "Shilhim." This town was in Southwestern Pal and is very probably identical with the fortress Sharhana, a place of some importance on the road from Gaza to Egypt. Aahmes (XVIIIth Dynasty) besieged and captured this city in the 5th year of his reign in his pursuit of the flying Hyksos (Petrie, Hist, II, 22, 35), and a century later Tahutmes III, in the 23d year of his reign, took the city of Sharuhen on his way to the siege and capture of Megiddo (Petrie, Hist, II, 104). On philological grounds Tell esh-Sheri'ah, 12 miles N.W. of Beersheba, a large ruin, has been proposed, but it does not suit at all the Egyp data (PEF, III, 399, Sh XXIV).

SHAASHGAZ, shā-ash′gaz (שַׁעַשְׁגַז, sha'ash-gāz; LXX reads Γαί, Gaí, the same name it gives to the official referred to in Est 2 8.15; the name may go back to the Old Bactrian word Sāsakshant, "one anxious to learn" [Scheft]; most commentators suggest no explanation): A chamberlain of Ahasuerus, king of Persia; as keeper of "the second house of women," he had Esther under his charge (ver 14).

SHABBETHAI, shab′ė-thī (שַׁבְּתַי, shabb^{e}thay, "one born on the Sabbath"; B, Σαβαθαί, Sabathaí, A, Καββαθαί, Kabbathaí = "Sabbateus" of 1 Esd 9 14): A Levite who opposed (?) Ezra's suggestion that the men who had married foreign wives put them aside (Ezr 10 15). Kuenen, however, renders the phrase עָמְדוּ עַל זֹאת, 'ām^{e}dhū 'al zō'th, of which Asahiel and Jahaziah are the subjects, to mean "stand over," "have charge of," rather than "stand against," "oppose" (Gesammelte Abhandlungen, 247 f); this would make Shabbethai, who was in accord with the two men mentioned above, an ally rather than an opponent of Ezra. We incline toward Kuenen's interpretation in view of the position attained by Shabbethai under Nehemiah—one he would have been unlikely to attain had he been hostile to Ezra. He is mentioned among those appointed to explain the Law (Neh 8 7), and as one of the chiefs of the Levites who had the oversight of "the outward business of the house of God" (Neh 11 16). Horace J. Wolf

SHACHIA, sha-kī′a, shak′i-a (שָׂכְיָה, sākh^{e}yāh [so Baer, Ginsberg]; some edd read שָׂכְיָא, sākh^{e}yā', or שַׂכְיָא, sakh^{e}yā'; also שָׁכְיָה, shākh^{e}yāh, and שָׁבְיָה, shābh^{e}yāh. This last reading is favored by the Syrian and the LXX [B, Σαβία, Sabía, A, Σεβιά, Sebiá, but Luc., Σεχιά, Sechiá]; the forms in kh (כ) instead of bh (ב) have the support of the Vulg, Sechia, "Yahweh has forgotten"[?]): A name in a genealogy of Benjamin (1 Ch 8 10).

SHADDAI, shad′ȧ-ī, shad′ī. See God, Names of, II, 8.

SHADE, shād, SHADOW, shad′ō, SHADOWING, shad′ō-ing (צֵל, çēl; σκιά, skiá): A shadow is any obscuration of the light and heat with the form of the intervening object, obscurely projected, constantly changing and passing away. "Shadow" is used lit. of a roof (Gen 19 8), of mountains (Jgs 9 36), of trees (Jgs 9 15, etc), of wings (Ps 17 8, etc), of a cloud (Isa 25 5), of a great rock (Isa 32 2), of a man (Peter, Acts 5 15), of the shadow on the dial (2 K 20 9, etc), of Jonah's gourd (Jon 4 5 f). It is used also figuratively (1) of shelter and protection (of man, Gen 19 8; Cant 2 3; Isa 16 3, etc; of God, Ps 36 7; 91 1; Isa 4 6, etc); (2) of anything fleeting or transient, as of the days of man's life on earth (1 Ch 29 15; Job 8 9; Ps 109 23); (3) with the idea of obscurity or imperfection (in He 8 5; 10 1, of the Law; cf Col 2 17); (4) of darkness, gloom; see Shadow of Death. In Jas 1 17, we have in AV, "the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning" (aposkíasma), RV "shadow that is cast by turning"; the reference is to the unchangeableness of God as contrasted with the changes of the heavenly bodies. RV has "of the rustling of wings" for "shadowing with wings" in Isa 18 1; ARV has "shade" for "shadow" in various places (Jgs 9 15; Job 40 22; Isa 4 6, etc). In Job 40 21.22, for "shady trees" RV has "lotus-trees." W. L. Walker

SHADOW OF DEATH (צַלְמָוֶת, çalmāweth): The Heb word tr^{d} "shadow of death" is used poetically for thick darkness (Job 3 5), as descriptive of Sheol (Job 10 21 f; 12 22; 38 17); figuratively of deep distress (Job 12 22; 16 16; 24 17 bis; 28 3; 34 22 [in the last three passages ARV has "thick darkness" and "thick gloom"]; Ps 23 4, RVm "deep darkness [and so elsewhere]"; 44 19; 107 10.14; Isa 9 2; Jer 2 6; 13 16; Am 5 8; Mt 4 16; Lk 1 79, skiá thanátou). The Heb word is perhaps composed of çēl, "shadow," and māweth, "death," and the idea of "the valley of the shadow of death" was most probably derived from the deep ravines, darkened by over-hanging briars, etc, through which the shepherd had sometimes to lead or drive his sheep to new and better pastures. W. L. Walker

SHADRACH, shā'drak: The Bab name of one of the so-called Heb children. Shadrach is probably the Sumerian form of the Bab Kudurru-Aki, "servant of Sin." It has been suggested by Meinhold that we should read Merodach instead of Shadrach. Since there were no vowels in the original Heb or Aram., and since sh and m as well as r and d are much alike in the old alphabet in which Dnl was written, this change is quite possible.

Shadrach and his two companions were trained along with Daniel at the court of Nebuchadnezzar, who had carried all four captive in the expedition against Jerus in the 3d year of Jehoiakim (Dnl 1 1). They all refused to eat of the food provided by Ashpenaz, the master who had been set over them by the king, but preferred to eat pulse (Dnl 1 12). The effect was much to their advantage, as they appeared fairer and fatter in flesh than those who ate of the king's meat. At the end of the appointed time they passed satisfactory examinations, both as to their physical appearance and their intellectual acquirements, so that none were found like them among all with whom the king communed, and they stood before the king (see Dnl 1).

When Daniel heard that the wise men of Babylon were to be slain because they could not tell the dream of Nebuchadnezzar, after he had gained a respite from the king, he made the thing known to his three companions that they might unite with him in prayer to the God of heaven that they all might not perish with the rest of the wise men of Babylon. After God had heard their prayer and the dream was made known to the king by Daniel, Nebuchadnezzar, at Daniel's request, set Shadrach, Meshach and Abed-nego over the affairs of the province of Babylon (Dnl 2). With Meshach and Abed-nego, Shadrach was cast into a fiery furnace, but escaped unhurt (Dnl 3). See Abed-nego; Hananiah; Song of Three Children.

SHADY, shād'i, TREES (Job 40 21 f). See Lotus Trees.

SHAFT, shaft: Isa 49 2 for חֵץ, ḥēç, "an arrow"; also Ex 25 31; 37 17; Nu 8 4 AV for a part of the candlestick of the tabernacle somewhat vaguely designated by the word יָרֵךְ, yārēkh, "thigh." The context in the first 2 verses shows that the upright stem or "shaft" is intended, but in Nu 8 4 a different context has caused RV to substitute "base." See also Archery; Armor, Arms.

SHAGEE, shā'gē (שָׁגֵא, shāghē'; B, Σωλά, Sōlá, A, Σαγή, Sagḗ; AV Shage): The father of Jonathan, one of David's heroes (1 Ch 11 34).

SHAHARAIM, shā-ha-rā'im (שַׁחֲרַיִם, shaḥărayim; B, Σααρήλ, Saarḗl, A, Σααρήμ, Saarḗm): A Benjamite name (1 Ch 8 8). The passage is corrupt beyond only the most tentative emendation. "Sharaim" has no connection with the foregoing text. One of the suggested restorations of vs 8.9 reads: "And Shaharaim begat in the field of Moab, after he had driven them [i.e. the Moabites] out, from Hodesh his wife, Jobab," etc (Curtis, ICC).

SHAHAZUMAH, shā-ha-zōō'ma, sha-haz'ŏŏ-ma (שַׁחֲצוּמָה, shaḥăçūmāh; B, Σαλειμ κατὰ θάλασσαν, Saleím katá thálassan, A, Σασειμάθ, Saseimáth; AV Shahazimah, sha-haz'i-mah): A town in the territory of Issachar on the boundary which ran from Tabor to the Jordan (Josh 19 22). The site, which has not yet been recovered, must be sought, probably, to the S.E. of the mountain.

SHALEM, shā'lem (שָׁלֵם, shālēm; εἰς Σαλήμ, eis Salḗm): The word as a place-name occurs only in Gen 33 18. With Luther, following LXX, Pesh and Vulg, AV reads "And Jacob came to Shalem, a city of Shechem." RV with the Tgs Onḳelos and pseudo-Jonathan, the Sam codex and the Arab., reads, "came in peace to the city of Shechem." There is a heavy balance of opinion among scholars in favor of the latter reading. It is certainly a remarkable fact, supporting AV, that about 4 miles E. of Shechem (Nāblus), there is a village bearing the name Sālem. If AV is right, this must represent the city referred to; and E. of Sālem would transpire the events recorded in Gen 44. Against this is the old tradition locating Jacob's well and Joseph's tomb near to Shechem. Onom gets over the difficulty by identifying Shalem with Shechem.

SHALIM, shā'lim. See Shaalim.

SHALISHAH, sha-lī'sha, shal'i-shä, LAND OF (אֶרֶץ־שָׁלִשָׁה, 'ereç shālishāh; B, ἡ γῆ Σελχά, hē gḗ Selchá, A, ἡ γῆ Σαλισσά, hē gḗ Salissá): If the general indication of the route followed by Saul, given under Shaalim, is correct, the land of Shalishah (1 S 9 4) will lie to the N.E. of Lydda on the western slope of the range. Baal-shalishah would most likely be in the district, and may indeed have given its name to it. If Conder is right in identifying this city with Khirbet Kefr Thilth, about 19 miles N.E. of Jaffa, it meets well enough the general indication given above. Onom knows the name, but gives no guidance as to where the district is.

Baal-shalishah it places in the Thamnite region, 15 miles N. of Diospolis (Lydda). No boundaries can be laid down, but probability points to this neighborhood. W. Ewing

SHALLECHETH, shal′ĕ-keth, sha-lē′keth, THE GATE (שַׁעַר שַׁלֶּכֶת, sha‘ar shallekheth, i.e. as in m, "Casting forth"): A gate of the temple "at the causeway that goeth up" (1 Ch 26 16)—probably an ascent from the Tyropœon Valley to the W. of the temple. It has been supposed on account of the meaning of the name that the ashes and offal of the temple were cast forth there, but this is very unlikely—they were thrown into the Kidron valley to the E. or S.E. The LXX has παστοφορίον, pastophorion, which seems to point to a building with chambers; in consonance with this Cheyne reads in the Heb לִשְׁכּוֹת, lishkōth, "[of] the chambers." E. W. G. Masterman

SHALLUM, shal′um (שַׁלּוּם, shallūm, שַׁלֻּם, shallum; various forms in LXX): This is the name of not less than 12 Heb persons:

(1) The youngest son of Naphtali (1 Ch 7 13). He is also called "Shillem" in Gen 46 24; Nu 26 49.

(2) A descendant of Simeon, the son of Shaul and the father of Mibsam (1 Ch 4 25). He lived in 1618 BC.

(3) The son of Sismai "son" of Shesham of the tribe of Judah (1 Ch 2 40.41). He lived in 1300 BC.

(4) A son of Kore, a porter of the sanctuary during the reign of David (1 Ch 9 17.19.31; Ezr 2 42; Neh 7 45). The name is also written "Meshullam" in Neh 12 25, "Salum" in 1 Esd 5 28, "Meshelemiah" in 1 Ch 26 1.2.9, and "Shelemiah" in 1 Ch 26 14. He lived about 1050 BC.

(5) A son of Zadok and father of Hilkiah, a high priest and ancestor of Ezra the scribe (1 Ch 6 12.13; Ezr 7 2). In the works of Jos he is called "Sallumus"; in 1 Esd 8 1, "Salem," and in 2 Esd 1 1, "Salemas."

(6) The 15th king of Israel. See following article.

(7) A son of Bani, a priest who had taken a heathen wife and was compelled by Ezra the scribe to put her away (Ezr 10 42; omitted in 1 Esd 9 34).

(8) The father of Jehizkiah, an Ephraimite in the time of Ahaz king of Israel (2 Ch 28 12).

(9) The husband of the prophetess Huldah (2 K 22 14; 2 Ch 34 22). He was the keeper of the sacred wardrobe and was probably the uncle of Jeremiah the prophet (Jer 32 7; cf Jer 35 4).

(10) King of Judah and son of Josiah (Jer 22 11; 1 Ch 3 15), better known by the name Jehoahaz II. This name he received when he ascended the throne of the kingdom of Judah (2 Ch 36 1).

(11) A Levite who was a porter at the time of Ezra (Ezr 10 24; "Sallumus" in 1 Esd 9 25).

(12) A ruler over a part of Jerus and a son of Hallohesh. He with his daughters aided in building the walls of Jerus in the time of Nehemiah (Neh 3 12). S. L. Umbach

SHALLUM (שַׁלּוּם, shallūm, שַׁלֻּם, shallum, "the requited one" [2 K 15 10–15]): The 15th king of Israel, and successor of Zechariah, whom he publicly assassinated in the 7th month of his reign. Nothing more is known of Shallum than that he was a son of Jabesh, which may indicate that he was a Gileadite from beyond Jordan. He is said to have made "a conspiracy" against Zechariah, so was not alone in his crime. The conspirators, however, had but a short-lived success, as, when Shallum had "reigned for the space of a month in Samaria," Menahem, then at Tirzah, one of the minor capitals of the kingdom, went up to Samaria, slew him and took his place.

It was probably at this time that Syria threw off the yoke of tribute to Israel (see Jeroboam II), as when next we meet with that kingdom, it is under its own king and in alliance with Samaria (2 K 16 5).

The 10 years of rule given to Menahem (2 K 15 17) may be taken to include the few months of military violence under Zechariah and Shallum, and cover the full years 758–750, with portions of years before and after counted as whole ones. The unsuccessful usurpation of Shallum may therefore be put in 758 BC (some date lower). W. Shaw Caldecott

SHALLUN, shal′un (שַׁלּוּן, shallūn, not in LXX): Another form of Shallum, the son of Col-hozeh. He was the ruler of the district of Mizpah. He assisted Nehemiah in building the wall of Jerus and in repairing the gate by the Pool of Siloah at the King's Gardens (Neh 3 15).

SHALMAI, shal′mī, shal′mā-ī: AV form in Ezr 2 46 for "Shamlai"; Neh 7 48 "Salmai" (q.v.).

SHALMAN, shal′man (שַׁלְמַן, shalmān): A name of uncertain meaning, found only once in the OT (Hos 10 14), in connection with a place-name, equally obscure, "as Shalman destroyed Beth-arbel." Shalman is most commonly interpreted as a contracted form of Shalmaneser, the name of several Assyr kings. If this explanation is correct, the king referred to cannot be identified. Some have thought of Shalmaneser IV, who is said to have undertaken expeditions against the West in 775 and in 773–772. Others have proposed Shalmaneser V, who attacked Samaria in 725. This, however, is improbable, because the activity of Hosea ceased before Shalmaneser V became king. Shalman has also been identified with Salamanu, a king of Moab in the days of Hosea, who paid tribute to Tiglath-pileser V of Assyria; and with Shalmah, a North Arabian tribe that invaded the Negeb. The identification of Beth-arbel (q.v.) is equally uncertain. From the reference it would seem that the event in question was well known and, therefore, probably one of recent date and considerable importance, but our present historical knowledge does not enable us to connect any of the persons named with the destruction of any of the localities suggested for Beth-arbel. The ancient tr^s offer no solution; they too seem to have been in the dark. F. C. Eiselen

SHALMANESER, shal-ma-nē′zẽr (שַׁלְמַנְאֶסֶר, shalman′eṣer; LXX Σαμεννάσαρ, Samennásar, Σαλμανάσαρ, Salmanásar): The name of several Assyr kings. See Assyria; Assyrian Captivity. It is Shalmaneser IV who is mentioned in the Bib. history (2 K 17 3; 18 9). He succeeded Tiglath-pileser on the throne in 727 BC, but whether he was a son of his predecessor, or a usurper, is not apparent. His reign was short, and, as no annals of it have come to light, we have only the accounts contained in 2 K for his history. In the passages referred to above, we learn that Hoshea, king of Israel, who had become his vassal, refused to continue the payment of tribute, relying upon help from So, king of Egypt. No help, however, came from Egypt, and Hoshea had to face the chastising forces of his suzerain with his own unaided resources, the result being that he was taken prisoner outside Samaria and most likely carried away to Nineveh. The Bib. narrative goes on to say that the king of Assyria came up throughout all the land, and went up to Samaria and besieged it 3 years. There is reason to believe that, as the siege of Samaria was proceeding, Shalmaneser retired to Nineveh and died, for, when the city was taken in 722 BC, it is Sargon who claims, in his copious annals, to have captured it and carried its inhabitants into captivity. It is just possible that Shalman (Hos 10 14) is a contraction for Shalmaneser, but the identity of Shalman and of Beth-arbel named in the same passage is not sufficiently made out.

SHAMAI, sham′ȧ-ī. See Salmai.

SHAMARIAH, sham-a-rī′a, sha-mär′ya. See Shemariah.

SHAMBLES, sham′b'lz (μάκελλον, mákellon): A slaughter-house; then a butcher's stall, meat-market. The word is once used in the NT in 1 Cor 10 25.

SHAME, shām (בּוֹשׁ, bōsh, "to be ashamed," בֹּשֶׁת, bōsheth, "shame," קָלוֹן, ḳālōn; αἰσχύνη, aischúnē, "ignominy," ἀτιμία, atimía, "dishonor," and other words): An oft-recurring word in Scripture almost uniformly bound up with a sense of sin and guilt. It is figuratively set forth as a wild beast (Jer 3 24), a Nessus-garment (3 25), a blight (20 18), a sin against one's own soul (Hab 2 10), and twice as the condensed symbol of Heb abomination—Baal (Jer 11 13 m; Hos 9 10 m; see Ish-bosheth). It is bracketed with defeat (Isa 30 3), reproach (Ps 69 7; Isa 54 4; Mic 2 6), confusion (Isa 6 7), nakedness (Isa 47 3; Mic 1 11), everlasting contempt (Dnl 12 2), folly (Prov 18 13), cruelty (Isa 50 6; He 12 2), poverty (Prov 13 18), nothingness (Prov 9 7 AV), unseemliness (1 Cor 11 6; 14 35 AV; Eph 5 12), and "them that go down to the pit" (Ezk 32 25). In the first Bib. reference to this emotion, "shame" appears as "the correlative of sin and guilt" (Delitzsch, New Comm. on Gen and Bib. Psychology). Shamelessness is characteristic of abandoned wickedness (Phil 3 19; Jude ver 13, m "Gr 'shames'"). Manifestly, then, shame is a concomitant of the Divine judgment upon sin; the very worst that a Hebrew could wish for an enemy was that he might be clothed with shame (Ps 109 29), that the judgment of God might rest upon him visibly.

Naturally, to the Hebrew, shame was the portion of those who were idolaters, who were faithless to Jeh or who were unfriendly to themselves—the elect people of Jeh. Shame is to come upon Moab because Moab held Israel in derision (Jer 48 39.27), and upon Edom "for violence against his brother Jacob" (Ob ver 10). But also, and impartially, shame is the portion of faithless Israelites who deny Jeh and follow after strange gods (Ezk 7 18; Mic 7 10; Hos 10 6, and often). But shame, too, comes upon those who exalt themselves against God, who trust in earthly power and the show of material strength (2 Ch 32 21; Isa 30 3); and upon those who make a mock of righteousness (Job 8 22; Ps 35 26; 132 18). With a fine sense of ethical distinctions the Bib. writers recognize that in confessing to a sense of shame there is hope for better things. Only in the most desperate cases is there no sense of shame (Hos 4 18; Zeph 3 5; Phil 3 19; Jude ver 13); in pardon God is said to remove shame (Isa 54 4 bis; 61 7).

On conditions beyond the grave the Bib. revelation is exceedingly reticent, but here and there are hints that shame waits upon the wicked here and hereafter. Such an expression as that in Dnl (12 2) cannot be ignored, and though the writing itself may belong to a late period and a somewhat sophisticated theological development, the idea is but a reflection of the earlier and more elementary period, when the voice of crime and cruelty went up from earth to be heard in the audience chamber of God (Gen 4 11; 6 13). In the NT there is similar reticence but also similar implications. It cannot be much amiss to say that in the mind of the Bib. writers sin was a shameful thing; that part of the punishment for sin was a consciousness of guilt in the sense of shame; and that from this consciousness of guilt there was no deliverance while the sin was unconfessed and unforgiven. "Many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life and some to shame and everlasting contempt." From one's own past there is no deliverance, save through contrition of spirit and the grace and forgiveness of God. While the sense of shame persists, or, in other words, while the moral constitution of man's nature remains as it is, there will never be wanting an avenger of sin.

SHAMED, shā′med. See Shemed.

SHAMEFACEDNESS, shām′fāst-nes, shām-fās′ed-nes. See Shamefastness.

SHAMEFASTNESS, shām′fast-nes: The original AV tr of αἰδώς, aidṓs, in Sir 41 16 and 1 Tim 2 9. Perhaps half a century later the spelling "shamefacedness" supplanted the better form, and continues in the ordinary editions of the King James Version. RV, however, rightly restores "shamefastness."

SHAMER, shā′mẽr. See Shemer.

1. Biblical Account

SHAMGAR, sham′gär (שַׁמְגַּר, shamgar): One of the judges, son of Anath (‘ănāth), in whose days, which preceded the time of Deborah (Jgs 5 6.7) and followed those of Ehud, Israel's subjugation was so complete that "the highways were unoccupied, and the travelers walked through byways." The government had become thoroughly disorganized, and apparently, as in the days of Deborah, the people were entirely unprepared for war. Shamgar's improvised weapon with which he helped to "save Israel" is spoken of as an ox-goad. With this he smote of the Philis 600 men. This is the first mention of the Philis as troublesome neighbors of the Israelites (Jgs 3 31). According to a tradition represented in Jos (Ant, V, iv, 3), Shamgar died in the year he became judge.

2. Critical Hypotheses

Several writers have challenged the Bib. account on the following grounds: that in Jgs 5 no mention is made of any deliverance; that the name "Shamgar" resembles the name of a Hittite king and the name "Anath" that of a Syrian goddess; that the deed recorded in Jgs 3 31 is analogous to that of Samson (Jgs 15 15), and that of Shammah, son of Agee (2 S 23 11 f); and lastly, that in a group of Gr MSS and other VSS this verse is inserted after the account of Samson's exploits. None of these is necessarily inconsistent with the traditional account. Nevertheless, they have been used as a basis not only for overthrowing the tradition, but also for constructive theories such as that which makes Shamgar a foreign oppressor and not a judge, and even the father of Sisera. There is, of course, no limit to which this kind of interesting speculation cannot lead.

SHAMIR, shā′mẽr (שָׁמִיר, shāmīr; Σαμείρ, Sameír):

(1) Mentioned along with Jattir and Socoh (Josh 15 48) as one of the cities of Judah in the hill country. Possibly it is Kh. (or Umm) Sōmerah, 2,000 ft. above sea-level, a site with ancient walls, caves, cisterns and tombs not far W. of Debîr (edh Dhatherîyeh) and 2 miles N. of Anab (ʿAnab) (PEF, III, 262, 286, Sh XX).

(2) A place in the hill country of Ephraim (Jgs 10 1) from which came "Tola, the son of Pual, a man of Issachar," who judged Israel 23 years; he died and was buried there. It is an attractive theory (Schwartz) which would identify the place with the semi-fortified and strongly-placed town of Sanûr on the road from Nāblus to Jenîn. A local chieftain in the early part of the last century fortified Sanûr and from there dominated the whole district. That Sanûr could hardly have been within the bounds of Issachar is an objection, but not necessarily a fatal one. It is noticeable that LXX A has Σαμάρεια, Samáreia, for Shamir (PEF, II, Sh XI). E. W. G. Masterman

SHAMLAI, sham′lā̇-ī, sham′lī. See Salmai.

SHAMMA, sham′a (שַׁמָּא, shammā′; B, Σεμά, Semá, A, Σαμμά, Sammá): An Asherite (1 Ch 7 37).

SHAMMAH, sham′a (שַׁמָּה, shammāh):

(1) The son of Reuel, the son of Esau, a tribal chief of Edom (Gen 36 13.17; 1 Ch 1 37, Σομέ, Somé).

(2) The third son of Jesse and brother of David. Together with his two other brothers he fought under Saul in the campaign against the Philis and was with the army in the valley of Elah when David slew Goliath (1 S 17 13 ff). One redactor states that he was a witness of the anointing of David by Samuel (1 S 16 1–13). He was the father of Jonadab, the friend of Amnon (2 S 13 3 ff), and that Jonathan whose victory over a Phili giant is narrated in 2 S 21 20 ff was also his son. His name is rendered as "Shammah" (1 S 16 9; 17 13), "Shimeah" (2 S 13 3.32), "Shimei" (2 S 21 21), and "Shimea" (1 Ch 2 13; 20 7).

(3) The son of Agee, a Hararite, one of the "three mighty men" of David (2 S 23 11, LXX Σαμαιά, Samaiá), who held the field against the Philis. The ‖ passage (1 Ch 11 10 ff) ascribes this deed to Eleazar, the son of Dodo. The succeeding incident (2 S 23 13 ff), viz. the famous act of three of David's heroes who risked their lives to bring their leader water from the well of Bethlehem, has frequently been credited to Shammah and two other members of "the three"; but the three warriors are plainly said (ver 13) to belong to "the thirty"; ver 33 should read "Jonathan, son of Shammah, the Hararite." Jonathan, one of David's "thirty," was a son of Shammah; the word "son" has been accidentally omitted (Driver, Budde, Kittel, etc). The ‖ passage (1 Ch 11 34) has "son of Shagee," which is probably a misreading for "son of Agee." Lucian's version, "son of Shammah," is most plausible. "Shimei the son of Ela" (1 K 4 18) should also appear in this passage if Lucian's reading of "Ela" for "Agee" (2 S 23 11) be correct.

(4) A Harodite (2 S 23 25.33), i.e. probably a native of ʿAin-ḥarod (ʿAin Jalūd, Jgs 7 1; see Harod). One of "the thirty" and captain of Solomon's 5th monthly course. In the ‖ lists (1 Ch 11 27) he is called "the Harorite" (this last being a scribal error for Harodite) and "Shamhuth the Izrahite" (1 Ch 27 8). Horace J. Wolf

SHAMMAI, sham′ā̇-ī, sham′ī (שַׁמַּי, shammay):

(1) A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 2 28.32).

(2) The son of Rekem and father of Maon (1 Ch 2 44 ff).

(3) A Judahite (1 Ch 4 17).

SHAMMOTH, sham′oth, sham′ōth. See Shammah, (4).

SHAMMUA, SHAMMUAH, sha-mū′a, sham′ů-a (שַׁמּוּעַ, shammūaʿ):

(1) The Reubenite spy (Nu 13 4, Σαμουήλ, Samouḗl, and other forms).

(2) One of David's sons (2 S 5 14; 1 Ch 14 4, Σαμμοῦς, Sammoús). In 1 Ch 3 5 he is called "Shimea."

(3) A Levite (Neh 11 17); he is called "Shemaiah" in 1 Ch 9 16.

(4) The head of a priestly family (Neh 12 18); a contemporary of Joiakim.

SHAMSHERAI, sham′shḗ-rī, sham-shḗ-rā′ī (שַׁמְשְׁרַי, shamshᵉray): A Benjamite (1 Ch 8 26).

SHAPE, shāp: In AV the tr of εἶδος, eídos, "form," "appearance" (Lk 3 22; Jn 5 37), and of ὁμοίωμα, homoíōma, "likeness," "resemblance" (Rev 9 7). The meaning of these words is not so much "tangible shape," in which sense we use the word in modern Eng., but rather "aspect," "appearance," the looks of a thing or a person. This is even the case where the word is joined with the adj. σωματικός, sōmatikós, "bodily," as in the passage Lk 3 22, "The Holy Spirit descended in a bodily form [i.e. "in a corporeal appearance," AV "in a bodily shape"], as a dove, upon him." The second passage also refers to the "appearance" of God, and cannot therefore be regarded as material shape: "Ye have neither heard his voice at any time, nor seen his form" (AV "shape") (Jn 5 37). As has been seen from the above quotations, RV, which retains the tr "shape" for homoiōma, has trᵈ eidos with "form," which also serves to render several other Gr synonyms, such as μορφή, morphḗ (Mk 16 12; Phil 2 6 f), μόρφωσις, mórphōsis (Rom 2 20; 2 Tim 3 5), τύπος, túpos (RVm "pattern," Rom 6 17), and ὑποτύπωσις, hupotúpōsis (RV "pattern," 2 Tim 1 13). In AV Wisd 18 1 "shape" translates morphē, RV "form."

SHAPHAM, shā′fam (שָׁפָם, shāphām; Σαφάμ, Saphám, Σαβάτ, Sabát): Name of a Gadite chief, who had the second place in command of his tribe (1 Ch 5 12). So far as the fragmentary genealogies are intelligible, they seem to indicate that Shapham and his chief, Joel, lived in the time of Saul and shared in the war against the Hagrites (1 Ch 5 7–10.18–22), but it is to be noted that these lists were first recorded between the years 750 and 740 BC, just before the eastern tribes were carried into captivity.

SHAPHAN, shā′fan (שָׁפָן, shāphān, "rock-badger," EV "coney"; Σαφφάν, Saphphán): An old totem clan name (so W. R. Smith; cf, however, art. Totemism; Gray, HPN, 103 ff, and Jacob's Studies in Bib. Archaeology, 84 ff).

(1) Son of Azaliah and scribe of King Josiah. He received from Hilkiah the Book of the Law which had been found in the Temple (2 K 22 3 ff; 2 Ch 34 8–28). It was from Shaphan's lips that Josiah heard the Law read. Shaphan was also one of those sent by the king to the prophetess Huldah (2 K 22; 2 Ch 34). He was undoubtedly one of the staunchest supporters of Josiah in his work of reform. He was the father of Ahikam (2 K 22 12; 2 Ch 34 20; Jer 26 24), who befriended and protected the prophet Jeremiah. Another son, Elasah, was one of the two men intrusted by Jeremiah with his letter to the captives in Babylon (Jer 29 3). A third son, Gemariah, vainly tried to prevent King Jehoiakim from burning "the roll" (Jer 36 10.11.12. 25). The Micaiah of Jer 36 11.12, and Gedaliah, the governor of Judaea after the captivity of 586 BC, were his grandsons (Jer 39 14).

(2) Perhaps the father of Jaazaniah, one of the 70 men whom Ezekiel saw, in his vision of the Temple, sacrificing to idols (Ezk 8 11).

SHAPHAT, shā′fat (שָׁפָט, shāphāṭ):

(1) The Simeonite spy (Nu 13 5, Σαφάτ, Saphát).

(2) The father of the prophet Elisha (1 K 19 16; 2 K 3 11, LXX Sapháth).

(3) A name in the royal genealogy of Judah (1 Ch 3 22).

(4) A Gadite (1 Ch 5 12).

(5) One of David's herdsmen (1 Ch 27 29).

SHAPHER, shā′fẽr. See SHEPHER.

SHAPHIR, shā′fẽr (שָׁפִיר, shāphīr, "glittering"; καλῶς, kalôs; AV Saphir): One of a group of towns mentioned in Mic 1 10–15. From the association with Gath, Achzib (of Judah) and Mareshah, it would seem that the places mentioned were in Southwestern Pal. According to Onom, there was a Σαφείρ, Sapheír, "in the hill country" (from a confusion with Shamir [Josh 15 48], where LXX A has Sapheír) between Eleutheropolis and Ascalon. The name probably survives in that of three villages called es-Sūāfir, in the plain, some 3½ miles S.E. of Ashdod (PEF, II, 413, Sh XV). Cheyne (EB, col. 4282) suggests the white "glittering" hill Tell eṣ-Ṣāfi, at the entrance to the Wâdy eṣ-Sunṭ, which was known to the Crusaders as Blanchegarde, but this site seems a more probable one for GATH (q.v.).

E. W. G. MASTERMAN

SHARAI, sha-rā′ī, shā′rī (שָׁרַי, shāray): One of the sons of Bani who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 40).

SHARAR, shā′rar. See SACAR.

SHARE, shār. See PLOW.

SHAREZER, sha-rē′zẽr (שַׂרְאֶצֶר, sar'eçer, 'שַׁ, shar'eçer): Corresponds to the Assyr Shar-uṣur, "protect the king"; found otherwise, not as a complete name, but as elements in personal names, e.g. Bel-shar-uṣur, "may Bel protect the king," which is the equivalent of Belshazzar (Dnl 5 1). The name is borne by two persons in the OT:

(1) The son of Sennacherib, king of Assyria, who with ADRAMMELECH (q.v.) murdered his father (2 K 19 37; Isa 37 38). The Bab Chronicle says concerning Sennacherib's death: "On the 20th day of Tebet Sennacherib, king of Assyria, was slain by his son in a revolt." This differs from the OT account in that it speaks of only one murderer, and does not give his name. How the two accounts can be harmonized is still uncertain. Hitzig, (Kritik, 194 ff), following Abydenus, as quoted by Eusebius, completed the name of Sennacherib's son, so as to read Nergal-sharezer = Nergal-shar-uṣur (Jer 39 3.13), and this is accepted by many modern scholars. Johns thinks that Sharezer (shar'eçer or sar'eçer) may be a corruption from Shar-etir-Ashur, the name of a son of Sennacherib (1-vol HDB, s.v.). The question cannot be definitely settled.

(2) A contemporary of the prophet Zechariah, mentioned in connection with the sending of a delegation to the spiritual heads of the community to inquire concerning the propriety of continuing the fasts: "They of Beth-el had sent Sharezer and Regem-melech" (Zec 7 2). This tr creates a difficulty in connection with the succeeding words, lit. "and his men." The Revisers place in the margin as an alternative rendering, "They of Beth-el, even Sharezer . . . . had sent." Sharezer sounds peculiar in apposition to "they of Beth-el"; hence some have thought, esp. since Sharezer seems incomplete, that in the two words Beth-el and Sharezer we have a corruption of what was originally a single proper name, perhaps Bel-sharezer = Bel-shar-uṣur = Belshazzar. The present text, no matter how tr^{d}, presents difficulties. See REGEM-MELECH.

SHARON, shâr′un (הַשָּׁרוֹן, ha-shārōn, with the def. art. possibly meaning "the plain"; τὸ πεδίον, tó pedíon, ὁ δρυμός, ho drumós, ὁ Σαρών, ho Sarôn):

(1) This name is attached to the strip of fairly level land which runs between the mountains and the shore of the Mediterranean, stretching from Nahr Rubīn in the S. to Mt. Carmel in the N. There are considerable rolling hills; but, compared with the mountains to the E., it is quite properly described as a plain. The soil is a deep rich loam, which is favorable to the growth of cereals. The orange, the vine and the olive grow to great perfection. When the many-colored flowers are in bloom it is a scene of rare beauty.

Of the streams in the plain four carry the bulk of the water from the western slopes of the mountains to the sea. They are also perennial, being fed by fountains. Nahr el-ʿAujeh enters the sea to the N. of Jaffa; Nahr Iskanderūneh 7 miles, and Nahr el-Mefjir fully 2 miles S. of Caesarea; and Nahr ez-Zerḳā, the "Crocodile River," 2½ miles N. of Caesarea. Nahr el-Fālik runs its short course about 12 miles N. of Nahr el-ʿAujeh. Water is plentiful, and at almost any point it may be obtained by digging. Deep, finely built wells near some of the villages are among the most precious legacies left by the Crusaders. The breadth of the plain varies from 8 to 12 miles, being broadest in the S. There are traces of a great forest in the northern part, which accounts for the use of the term drumos. Jos (Ant, XIV, xiii, 3) speaks of "the woods" (hoi drumoí) and Strabo (xvi) of "a great wood." There is still a considerable oak wood in this district. The "excellency" of Carmel and Sharon (Isa 35 2) is probably an allusion to the luxuriant oak forests. As in ancient times, great breadths are given up to the pasturing of cattle. Over David's herds that fed in Sharon was Shitrai the Sharonite (1 Ch 27 29). In the day of Israel's restoration "Sharon shall be a fold of flocks" (Isa 65 10). Jerome speaks of the fine cattle fed in the pastures of Sharon, and also sings the praises of its wine (Comm. on Isa 33 and 65). Toward the S. no doubt there was more cultivation then than there is at the present day. The Ger. colony to the N. of Jaffa, preserving in its name, Sarōna, the old Gr name of the plain, and several Jewish colonies are proving the wonderful productiveness of the soil. The orange groves of Jaffa are far-famed.

"The rose of Sharon" (Cant 2 1) is a mistranslation: ḥăbhaççeleth is not a "rose," but the white narcissus, which in season abounds in the plain.

Sharon is mentioned in the NT only in Acts 9 35.

(2) A district E. of the Jordan, occupied by the tribe of Gad (1 Ch 5 16; here the name is without the art.). Kittel ("Ch," SBOT) suggests that this is a corruption from "Sirion," which again is synonymous with Hermon. He would therefore identify Sharon with the pasture lands of Hermon. Others think that the mīshōr or table-land of Gilead is intended.

(3) In Josh 12 18 we should perhaps read "the king of Aphek in Sharon." See Lasharon. The order seems to point to some place N.E. of Tabor. Perhaps this is to be identified with the Sarona of Onom in the district between Tabor and Tiberias. If so, the name may be preserved in that of Sarōna on the plateau to the S.W. of Tiberias.

W. Ewing

Canaanitish descent. The patronymic Shaulites is found in Nu 26 13.

(3) An ancestor of Samuel (1 Ch 6 24 [Heb 9]); in ver 36 he is called "Joel."

SHAVEH, shā've, VALE OF (עֵמֶק שָׁוֵה, 'ēmeḳ shāwēh). See King's Vale.

SHAVEH-KIRIATHAIM, shā've-kir-ya-thā'im (שָׁוֵה קִרְיָתַיִם, shāweh ḳiryāthayim; ἐν Σαυὴ τῇ πόλει, en Sauē tē̂ pólei): Here Chedorlaomer is said to have defeated the Emim (Gen 14 5). RVm reads "the plain of Kiriathaim." If this rendering is right, we must look for the place in the neighborhood of Kiriathaim of Moab (Jer 48 1, etc), which is probably represented today by el-Ḳareiyāt, about 7 miles to the N. of Dibon.

Plain of Sharon.

SHARONITE, shār'un-īt (הַשָּׁרוֹנִי, ha-shārōnī; ὁ Σαρωνείτης, ho Sarōneítēs): Applied in Scripture only to Shitrai (1 Ch 27 29). See Sharon.

SHARUHEN, sha-rōō'hen (שָׁרוּחֶן, shārūḥen; οἱ ἀγροὶ αὐτῶν, hoi agroí autōn): One of the cities in the territory of Judah assigned to Simeon (Josh 19 6). In 15 32 it is called "Shilhim," and in 1 Ch 4 31, "Shaaraim" (q.v.).

SHASHAI, shā'shī (שָׁשַׁי, shāshay; Σεσεί, Sesei): One of the sons of Bani who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 40) = "Sesis" in 1 Esd 9 34.

SHASHAK, shā'shak (שָׁשָׁק, shāshak): Eponym of a Benjamite family (1 Ch 8 14.25).

SHAUL, shā'ul, SHAULITES, shā'ul-īts (שָׁאוּל, shā'ūl; Σαούλ, Saoúl):

(1) A king of Edom (Gen 36 37 ff = 1 Ch 1 48 ff).

(2) A son of Simeon (Gen 46 10; Ex 6 15; Nu 26 13; 1 Ch 4 24). The clan was of notoriously impure stock, and, therefore, Shaul is called "the son of a Canaanitish woman" (Gen 46 10; Ex 6 15); the clan was of mixed Israelitish and SHAVING, shāv'ing (in Job 1 20, גָּזַז, gāzaz, usually גָּלַח, gālaḥ; in Acts 21 24, ξυράω, xuráō): Customs as to shaving differ in different countries, and in ancient and modern times. Among the Egyptians it was customary to shave the whole body (cf Gen 41 14). With the Israelites, shaving the head was a sign of mourning (Dt 21 12; Job 1 20); ordinarily the hair was allowed to grow long, and was only cut at intervals (cf Absalom, 2 S 14 26). Nazirites were forbidden to use a razor, but when their vow was expired, or if they were defiled, they were to shave the whole head (Nu 6 5.9.18 ff; cf Acts 21 24). The shaving of the beard was not permitted to the Israelites; they were prohibited from shaving off even "the corner of their beard" (Lev 21 5). It was an unpardonable insult when Hanun, king of the Ammonites, cut off the half of the beards of the Israelites whom David had sent to him (2 S 10 4; 1 Ch 19 4).

Shaving "with a razor that is hired" is Isaiah's graphic figure to denote the complete devastation of Judah by the Assyr army (Isa 7 20).

SHAVSHA, shav'sha (שַׁוְשָׁא, shawshā'; in 2 S 20 25, Kᵉthībh, שְׁיָא, shᵉyā', Ḳᵉrē, שְׁוָא, shᵉwā', EV "Sheva," are refuted by LXX; in 2 S 8 15–18, in other respects identical with Ch, "Seraiah" is found; LXX varies greatly in all passages; it is the general consensus that Shavsha is correct): State secretary or scribe during the reign of David (1 Ch 18 16; 2 S 20 25). He was the first occupant of this office, which was created by David. It is significant that his father's name is omitted in the very exact list of David's officers of state (1 Ch 18 14–17 ‖ 2 S 8 15–18); this fact, coupled with the foreign sound of his name, points to his being an "alien"; the assumption that the state secretary handled correspondence with other countries may explain David's choice of a foreigner for this post. Shavsha's two sons, Elihoreph and Ahijah, were secretaries of state under Solomon; they are called "sons of Shisha" (1 K 4 3), "Shisha" probably being a variant of "Shavsha."

Horace J. Wolf

SHAWL, shôl: RV substitutes "shawls" for AV "wimples" in Isa 3 22. See Dress.

SHEAF, shēf, SHEAVES, shēvz (אֲלֻמָּה, 'ălummāh, עֹמֶר, 'ōmer, עָמִיר, 'āmīr): When the grain is reaped, it is laid in handfuls back of the reaper to be gathered by children or those who cannot stand the harder work of reaping (Ps 129 7). The handfuls are bound into large sheaves, two of which are laden at a time on a donkey (cf Neh 13 15). In some districts carts are used (cf Am 2 13). The sheaves are piled about the threshing-floors until threshing time, which may be several weeks after harvest. It is an impressive sight to see the huge stacks of sheaves piled about the threshing-floors, the piles often covering an area greater than the nearby villages (see Agriculture). The ancient Egyptians bound their grain into small sheaves, forming the bundles with care so that the heads were equally distributed between the two ends (see Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, 1878, II, 424; cf Joseph's dream, Gen 37 5–8). The sheaves mentioned in Lev 32 10–12.15 must have been handfuls. It is a custom in parts of Syria for the gatherers of the sheaves to run toward a passing horseman and wave a handful of grain, shouting kemshi, kemshi (lit. "handful"). They want the horseman to feed the grain to his horse. In OT times forgotten sheaves had to be left for the sojourner (Dt 24 19); cf the kindness shown to Ruth by the reapers of Boaz (Ruth 2 7.15).

Figurative: "Being hungry they carry the sheaves" is a picture of torment similar to that of the hungry horse urged to go by the bundle of hay tied before him (Job 24 10). The joyful sight of the sheaves of an abundant harvest was used by the Psalmist to typify the joy of the returning captives (Ps 126 6).

James A. Patch

SHEAL, shē'al (שְׁאָל, shᵉ'āl, "request"): One of the Israelites of the sons of Bani who had taken foreign wives (Ezr 10 29, LXX Salouiá, LXX Luc., Assaḗl; 1 Esd 9 30, "Jasaelus").

SHEALTIEL, shḗ-ol'ti-el (שְׁאַלְתִּיאֵל, shᵉ'altī'ēl, but in Hag 1 12.14; 2 2, שַׁלְתִּיאֵל, shaltī'ēl; LXX and the NT always Σαλαθιήλ, Salathiḗl, hence "Salathiel" of 1 Esd 5 5.48.56; 6 2; AV of Mt 1 12; Lk 3 27): Father of Zerubbabel (Ezr 3 2.8; 5 2; Neh 12 1; Hag 1 1.12.14; 2 2.23). But, according to 1 Ch 3 17, Shealtiel was the oldest son of King Jeconiah; in ver 19 the MT makes Pedaiah, a brother of Shealtiel, the father of Zerubbabel (cf Curtis, ICC).

SHEAR, shēr. See Sheep; Sheep Tending.

SHEARIAH, shē-a-rī'a, shḗ-är'ya (שְׁעַרְיָה, shᵉ'aryāh; Σαραιά, Saraiá): A descendant of Saul (1 Ch 8 38; 9 44).

SHEARING, shēr'ing, HOUSE (בֵּית עֵקֶד הָרֹעִים, bēth 'ēḳedh hā-rō'īm, "house of binding of the shepherds"; B, Βαιθάκαθ [A, Βαιθάκαδ] τῶν ποιμένων, Baithákath [Baithákad] tōn poiménōn): Here, in the course of his extinction of the house of Ahab, Jehu met and destroyed 42 men, "the brethren of Ahaziah king of Judah" (2 K 10 12–14). Onom takes the phrase as a proper name, Bethacath, and locates the village 15 miles from Legio in the plain. This seems to point to identification with Beit Kād, about 3 miles E. of Jenīn.

SHEAR-JASHUB, shē-är-jā'shub or jash'ub (שְׁאָר יָשׁוּב, shᵉ'ār yāshūbh, "a remnant shall return"; LXX ho kataleiphtheís Iasoúb): The son of Isaiah, who accompanied him when he set out to meet Ahaz (Isa 7 3). The name like that of other children of prophets (cf "Immanuel," "Maher-shalal-hash-baz," "Lo-ruhamah," etc) is symbolic of a message which the prophet wishes to emphasize. Thus Isaiah uses the very words shᵉ'ār yāshūbh to express his oft-repeated statement that a remnant of Israel will return to Jeh (Isa 10 21).

SHEATH, shēth. See Sword.

SHEBA, shē'ba (שְׁבָא, shᵉbhā'; Σαβά, Sabá): (1) Sheba and Dedan are the two sons of Raamah son of Cush (Gen 10 7). (2) Sheba and Dedan are the two sons of Jokshan the son of Abraham and Keturah (25 3). (3) Sheba is a son of Joktan son of Eber who was a descendant of Shem (10 28).

From the above statements it would appear that Sheba was the name of an Arab tribe, and consequently of Sem descent. The fact that Sheba and Dedan are represented as Cushite (Gen 10 7) would point to a migration of part of these tribes to Ethiopia, and similarly their derivation from Abraham (25 3) would indicate that some families were located in Syria. In point of fact Sheba was a South-Arabian or Joktanite tribe (Gen 10 28), and his own name and that of some of his brothers (e.g. Hazarmaveth=Hadhramaut) are place-names in Southern Arabia.

The Sabaeans or people of Saba or Sheba, are referred to as traders in gold and spices, and as inhabiting a country remote from Pal (1 K 10 1 f; Isa 60 6; Jer 6 20; Ezk 27 22; Ps 72 15; Mt 12 42), also as slave-traders (Joel 3 8), or even desert-rangers (Job 1 15; 6 19; cf CIS 84 3).

By the Arab genealogists Saba is represented as great-grandson of Ḳaḥṭân (=Joktan) and ancestor of all the South-Arabian tribes. He is the father of Ḥimyar and Kahlân. He is said to have been named Saba because he was the first to take prisoners (shābhāh) in war. He founded the capital of Saba and built its citadel Marib (Mariaba), famous for its mighty barrage.

1. History

The authentic history of the Sabaeans, so far as known, and the topography of their country are derived from South-Arabian inscriptions, which began to be discovered about the middle of the last century, and from coins dating from about 150 BC to 150 AD, the first collection of which was published in 1880, and from the South-Arabian geographer Hamdānī, who was later made known to European scholars. One of the Sabaean kings is mentioned on Assyr inscriptions of the year 715 BC; and he is apparently not the earliest. The native monuments are scattered over the period extending from before that time until the 6th cent. AD, when the Sabaean state came to an end, being most numerous about the commencement of our era. Saba was the name of the nation of which Marib was the usual capital. The Sabaeans at first shared the sovereignty of South Arabia with Ḥimyar and one or two other nations, but gradually absorbed the territories of these some time after the Christian era. The form of government seems to have been that of a republic or oligarchy, the chief magistracy going by a kind of rotation, and more than one "king" holding office simultaneously (similarly Dt 4 47 and often in the OT). The people seem to have been divided into patricians and plebeians, the former of whom had the right to build castles and to share in the government.

2. Religion

A number of deities are mentioned on the inscriptions, two chief being Il-Makkih and Ta'lab. Others are Athtar (masc. form of the Bib. 'ashtārōth), Rammon (the Bib. Rimmon), the Sun, and others. The Sun and Athtar were further defined by the addition of the name of a place or tribe, just as Baal in the OT. Worship took the form of gifts to the temples, of sacrifices, esp. incense, of pilgrimages and prayers. Ceremonial ablution, and abstinence from certain things, as well as formal dedication of the worshipper and his household and goods to the deity, were also religious acts. In return the deity took charge of his worshipper's castle, wells, and belongings, and supplied him with cereals, vegetables and fruits, as well as granted him male issue.

3. Civilization

(1) The chief occupations of the Sabaeans were raiding and trade. The chief products of their country are enumerated in Isa 60 6, which agrees with the Assyr inscriptions. The most important of all commodities was incense, and it is significant that the same word which in the other Sem languages means "gold," in Sabaean means "perfume" (and also "gold"). To judge, however, from the number of times they are mentioned upon the inscriptions, agriculture bulked much more largely in the thoughts of the Sabaean than commerce, and was of equal importance with religion.

(2) The high position occupied by women among the Sabaeans is reflected in the story of the Queen of Sheba and Solomon. In almost all respects women appear to have been considered the equal of men, and to have discharged the same civil, religious and even military functions. Polygamy does not seem to have been practised. The Sabaean inscriptions do not go back far enough to throw any light upon the queen who was contemporary with Solomon, and the Arab. identification of her with Bilḳīs is merely due to the latter being the only Sabaean queen known to them. Bilḳīs must have lived several centuries later than the Heb monarch.

(3) The alphabet used in the Sabaean inscriptions is considered by Professor Margoliouth to be the original Sem alphabet, from which the others are derived. In other respects Sabaean art seems to be dependent on that of Assyria, Persia and Greece. The coins are Gr and Rom in style, while the system of weights employed is Persian. See further SABAEANS.

SHEBA, shē'ba (שֶׁ֫בַע, shebha'; Σάβεε, Sábee, or Σάμαα, Sámaa): The name of one of the towns allotted to Simeon (Josh 19 2). AV mentions it as an independent town, but as it is not mentioned at all in the parallel list (1 Ch 4 28), and is omitted in Josh 19 2 in some MSS, it is probable that RV is correct in its tr "Beer-sheba or Sheba." Only in this way can the total of towns in this group be made 13 (Josh 19 6). If it is a separate name, it is probably the same as SHEMA (q.v.).

SHEBA, QUEEN OF. See QUEEN OF SHEBA.

SHEBAM, shē'bam. See SEBAM.

SHEBANIAH, sheb-a-nī'a, shē̇-ban'ya (שְׁבַנְיָה, sh^{e}bhanyāh, in 1 Ch 15 24, sh^{e}bhanyāhū):

(1) Name of a Levite or a Levitical family that participated in the religious rites that followed the reading of the Law (Neh 9 4). The name is given in Neh 10 10 among those that sealed the covenant.

(2) A priest or Levite who took part in the sealing of the covenant (Neh 10 4; 12 14). See SHECANIAH.

(3) Another Levite who sealed the covenant (Neh 10 12).

(4) A priest in the time of David (1 Ch 15 24).

SHEBARIM, sheb'a-rim, shē̇-bā'rim (הַשְּׁבָרִים, ha-sh^{e}bhārīm; συνέτριψαν, sunétripsan): After the repulse of the first attack on their city the men of Ai chased the Israelites "even unto Shebarim" (Josh 7 5). RVm reads "the quarries"; so Keil, Steuernagel, etc. LXX reads "until they were broken," i.e. until the rout was complete. The direction of the flight was of course from Ai toward Gilgal in the Jordan valley. No trace of such a name has yet been found.

SHEBAT, she-bät' (שְׁבָט, sh^{e}bhāṭ): The 11th month of the Jewish year (Zec 1 7), corresponding to February. See CALENDAR.

SHEBER, shē'bēr (שֶׁ֫בֶר, shebher; B, Σάβερ, Sáber, A, Σέβερ, Séber): A son of Caleb by his concubine Maacah (1 Ch 2 48).

SHEBNA, sheb'na (שֶׁבְנָא, shebhnā'; Σόμνας, Sómnas; but שֶׁבְנָה, shebhnāh, in 2 K 18 18.26; meaning uncertain [2 K 18 18.26.37 and 19 2 = Isa 36 3.11.22 and 37 2; Isa 22 15]):

1. Position in Isa 22

In Isa 22 15 Shebna is referred to as he "who is over the house," or household, apparently that of the king. The phrase is tr^{d} "steward of the house" in RV of Gen 43 16.19; 44 1, and occurs also in 39 4, "overseer"; 44 4. It is used of an officer of the Northern Kingdom in 1 K 16 9; 18 3; 2 K 10 5. This officer is distinguished from him "that was over the city" in 2 K 10 5, and it is said in 2 K 15 5 that after his father Azariah was stricken with leprosy, "Jotham, the king's son, was over the household, judging all the people of the land." Again Isa 22 15 speaks of "this ṣōkhēn," a phrase that must apply to Shebna if the prophecy refers to him. This word is the participle of a vb. meaning "to be of use or service," so "to benefit" in Job 15 3; 22 2; 34 9. The fem. participle is employed of Abishag in 1 K 1 2.4, where AVm translates "cherisher"; BDB renders it "servitor" or "steward" in Isa 22 15. It occurs also as a Can. gloss in the Am Tab (Winckler no. 237.9). The ṣōkhēn was evidently a high officer: Shebna had splendid chariots (ver 18), but what the office exactly was is not certain. The other reference to Shebna in the title of the prophecy would lead one to conclude that it denoted him "who was over the household," i.e. governor of the palace, probably, or major-domo. The word ṣōkhēn is thus a general title; others deny this, maintaining that it would then occur more frequently.

2. Shebna in 2 K 18 f

In 2 K 18 f = Isa 36 f we find too a Shebna mentioned among the officers of Hezekiah. There he is called the ṣōphēr, "scribe" or "secretary," i.e. a minister of state of some kind, whereas Eliakim is he "who is over the household." Is then the Shebna of Isa 22 the same as this officer? It is of course possible that two men of the same name should hold high office about the same time. We find a Joah (ben Asaph) "recorder" under Hezekiah (2 K 18 18) and a Joah (ben Joahaz) having the very same position under Josiah a century later (2 Ch 34 8). But such a coincidence is rare. Had there been two high officers of state bearing this name, it is most probable that they would somehow have been distinguished one from the other. Shebna's name is thought to be Aram., thus pointing to a foreign descent, but G. B. Gray, "Isa," ICC, 373 ff, denies this. We can perhaps safely infer that he was a parvenu from the fact that he was hewing himself a sepulcher in Jerus, apparently among those of the Heb nobility, whereas a native would have an ancestral burial-place in the land.

However, in 2 K, Shebna is the scribe and not the governor of the palace. How is this to be explained? The answer is in Isaiah's prophecy.

3. Isa 22: 15 ff

The prophecy of Isa 22 divides itself into 3 sections. The words "against [not as RV "unto"] Shebna who is over the house," or palace, are properly the title of the prophecy, and should come therefore at the very beginning of ver 15.

(1) Vs 15–18 form one whole. In ver 16 the words "hewing him out a sepulchre," etc, should be placed immediately before the rest of the verse as ver 16*a* with the rest of the section is in the second person. We thus read (vs 15–17): 'Against Shebna who was over the house. Thus saith the Lord, Jeh of hosts, Go unto this steward [RVm] that is hewing him out a sepulchre on high, graving a habitation for himself in the rock, [and say] What doest thou here and whom hast thou here that thou hast hewed thee out here a sepulchre? Behold, Jeh of hosts, ...' etc. G. H. Box (Isa) would further transpose some parts of vs 17 f. Shebna is to be tossed like a ball into "a land wide of sides," i.e. a broad extensive land. He is addressed as a disgrace to the house of his royal master. The prophet's language is that of personal invective, and one asks what had made him so indignant. Some (e.g. Dillmann, Delitzsch) suggest that Shebna was the leader of a pro-Egyp party, while others (e.g. Cheyne) believe that the party was pro-Assyr (cf Isa 8 5–8*a*). The actual date of the prophecy can only be inferred.

(2) Isa 22 19–23 contains a prophecy which states that Eliakim is to be given someone's post, apparently that of Shebna, if this section be by Isaiah; ver 23, however, is held by many to be a gloss. These verses are not so vehement in tone as the previous ones. Some maintain that the section is not by Isaiah (Duhm, Marti). It can, however, be Isaianic, only later in date than vs 15 ff, being possibly meant to modify the former utterance. The palace governor is to lose his office and to be succeeded by Eliakim, who is seen to hold that post in 2 K 18 f (see Eliakim).

(3) Vs 24 f are additions to the two utterances by a later hand; they predict the ruin of some such official as Eliakim owing to his own family.

There is nothing a priori against believing that these three sections are entirely independent one of another, but there seems to be some connection between (1) and (2), and again between (2) and (3).

4. Date of the Prophecy

Now the question that has to be solved is that of the relation of Isa 22 15 ff with 2 K 18 f = Isa 36 f, where are given the events of 701 BC. We have the following facts: (a) Shebna is scribe in 701, and Eliakim is governor of the palace; (b) Shebna is governor of the palace in Isa 22 15, and is to be deposed; (c) if Isa 22 18–22 be by Isaiah, Eliakim was to succeed Shebna in that post. Omitting for the moment everything but (a) and (b), the only solution that is to any extent satisfactory is that Isa 22 15–18 is to be dated previous to 701 BC. This is the view preferred by G. B. Gray, op. cit. And this is the most satisfactory theory if we take (2) above into consideration. The prophecy then contained in (1) had not been as yet fulfilled in 701, but (2) had come to pass; Shebna was no longer governor of the palace, but held the position of scribe. Exile might still be in store for him.

Another explanation is put forward by K. Fullerton in AJT, IX, 621–42 (1905) and criticized by E. König in X, 675–86 (1906). Fullerton rejects vs 24 f as not due to Isaiah, and maintains that Isa 22 15–18 was spoken by the prophet early in the reign of Manasseh, i.e. later than 2 K 18 f, "not so much as a prophecy, a simple prediction, as an attempt to drive Shebna from office. . . . . It must be admitted that Isaiah probably did not succeed. The reactionary party seems to have remained in control during the reign of Manasseh. . . . . Fortunately, the moral significance of Isaiah does not depend on the fulfilment of this or that specific prediction. We are dealing not with a walking oracle, but with a great character and a noble life" (p. 639). He then infers from the massacres of Manasseh (2 K 21 16) "that a conspiracy had been formed against him by the prophetic party which proposed to place Eliakim on the throne" (p. 640). Isaiah he thinks would not "resort to such violent measures," and so the character of Isaiah makes it questionable whether he was the author of vs 20–23. This part would then be due to the prophetic party "who went a step farther than their great leader would approve." This view assumes too much, (a) that the terms in vs 20–23 refer to kingly power; (b) that Eliakim was of Davidic descent, unless we have a man of non-Davidic origin aiming at the throne, which is again a thing unheard of in Judah; and (c) that there was such a plot in the reign of Manasseh, of which we have no proof.

SHEBUEL, shḗ-bū′el, sheb′ū̆-el (שְׁבוּאֵל, shᵉbhū’ēl; Σουβαήλ, Soubaḗl):

(1) A son of Gershom and grandson of Moses (1 Ch 23 16). He was "ruler over the treasures" (26 24). In 24 20 he is called "Shubael," which is probably the original form of the name (see Gray, HPN, 310).

(2) A son of Heman (1 Ch 25 4), called in ver 20 "Shubael" (LXX as in ver 4).

SHECANIAH, SHECHANIAH, shek-a-nī′a, shḗ-kan′ya (שְׁכַנְיָה, shᵉkhanyāh [in 1 Ch 24 11; 2 Ch 31 15, shᵉkhanyāhū]; B, ’Ισχανιά, Ischaniá, Σεκενιά, Sekeniá):

(1) A descendant of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3 21.22). This is the same Shecaniah mentioned in Ezr 8 3.

(2) "The sons of Shecaniah," so the MT of Ezr 8 5 reads, were among those who returned with Ezra, but a name appears to have been lost from the text, and we should probably read "of the sons of Zattu, Shecaniah the son of Jahaziel" (cf 1 Esd 8 32, "of the sons of Zathoes, Sechenias the son of Jezelus").

(3) Chief of the tenth course of priests (1 Ch 24 11).

(4) A priest in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Ch 31 15).

(5) A contemporary of Ezra who supported him in his opposition to foreign marriages (Ezr 10 2).

(6) The father of Shemaiah, "the keeper of the east gate" (Neh 3 29).

(7) The father-in-law of Tobiah the Ammonite (Neh 6 18).

(8) The eponym of a family which returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 12 3). It is the same name which, by an interchange of (ב) bh and (כ) kh, appears as Shebaniah (see SHEBANIAH, [2]) in Neh 10 4.12.14. HORACE J. WOLF

SHECHEM, shē′kem (שְׁכֶם, sh^{e}khem, "shoulder"; Συχέμ, Suchém, ἡ Σίκιμα, hē Síkima, τὰ Σίκιμα, tá Síkima, etc; AV gives "Sichem" in Gen 12 6; and "Sychem" in Acts 7 16):

1. Historical

This place is first mentioned in connection with Abraham's journey from Haran. At the oak of Moreh in the vicinity he reared his first altar to the Lord in Pal (Gen 12 6 f). It was doubtless by this oak that Jacob, on his return from Paddan-aram, buried "the strange [ARV "foreign"] gods" (35 4). Hither he had come after his meeting with Esau (33 18). Onom here identifies Shechem with Shalem; but see SHALEM. To the E. of the city Jacob pitched his tent in a "parcel of ground" which he had bought from Hamor, Shechem's father (ver 19). Here also he raised an altar and called it El-Elohe-Israel, "God, the God of Israel" (ver 20). Then follows the story of Dinah's defilement by Shechem, son of the city's chief; and of the treacherous and terrible vengeance exacted by Simeon and Levi (ch 34). To the rich pasture land near Shechem Joseph came to seek his brethren (37 12 ff). It is mentioned as lying to the W. of Michmethath (el-Makhneh) on the boundary of Manasseh (Josh 17 7). It was in the territory of Ephraim; it was made a city of refuge, and assigned to the Kohathite Levites (20 7; 21 21). Near the city the Law was promulgated (Dt 27 11; Josh 8 33). When his end was approaching Joshua gathered the tribes of Israel here and addressed to them his final words of counsel and exhortation (ch 24). Under the oak in the neighboring sanctuary he set up the stone of witness (ver 26). The war of conquest being done, Joseph's bones were buried in the parcel of ground which Jacob had bought, and which fell to the lot of Joseph's descendants (ver 33). Abimelech, whose mother was a native of the city, persuaded the men of Shechem to make him king (Jgs 9 1–6), evidently seeking a certain consecration from association with "the oak of the pillar that was in Shechem." Jotham's parable was spoken from the cliff of Gerizim overhanging the town (vs 7 ff). After a reign of three years Abimelech was rejected by the people. He captured the city, razed it to the foundations, and sowed it with salt. It was then the seat of Can. idolatry, the temple of Baal-berith being here (Jgs 9 4.46). In the time of the kings we find that the city was once more a gathering-place of the nation. It was evidently the center, esp. for the northern tribes; and hither Rehoboam came in the hope of getting his succession to the throne confirmed (1 K 12 1; 2 Ch 10 1). At the disruption Jeroboam fortified the city and made it his residence (ver 25; Ant, VIII, viii, 4). The capital of the Northern Kingdom was moved, however, first to Tirzah and then to Samaria, and Shechem declined in political importance. Indeed it is not named again in the history of the monarchy. Apparently there were Israelites in it after the captivity, some of whom on their way to the house of the Lord at Jerus met a tragic fate at the hands of Ishmael ben Nethaniah (Jer 41 5 ff). It became the central city of the Samaritans, whose shrine was built on Mt. Gerizim (Sir 50 26; Ant, XI, viii, 6; XII, i, 1; XIII, iii, 4). Shechem was captured by John Hyrcanus in 132 BC (Ant, XIII, ix, 1; BJ, I, ii, 6). It appears in the NT only in the speech of Stephen (Acts 7 16, AV "Sychem"). Some (e.g. Smith, DB, s.v.) would identify it with Sychar of Jn 4 5; but see Sychar. Under the Romans it became Flavia Neapolis. In later times it was the seat of a bishopric; the names of five occupants of the see are known.

2. Location and Physical Features

There is no doubt as to the situation of ancient Shechem. It lay in the pass which cuts through Mts. Ephraim, Ebal and Gerizim, guarding it on the N. and S. respectively. Along this line runs the great road which from time immemorial has formed the easiest and the quickest means of communication between the E. of the Jordan and the sea. It must have been a place of strength from antiquity. The name seems to occur in Travels of a Mohar (Max Müller, Asien u. Europa, 394), "Mountain of Sahama" probably referring to Ebal or Gerizim. The ancient city may have lain somewhat farther E. than the modern Nāblus, in which the Rom name Neapolis survives. The situation is one of great beauty. Near the village and spring Balata important excavations were made by Sellin in 1926 and have been continued in '27 and '28. They probably represent the ancient Shechem. The great Hittite gate was found. Also what is believed to be the temple of Baal-berith (Jgs 8 33; 9 4). The "filling" in front of the gate of the temple revealed the meaning of the puzzling Heb word "millō" literally a "filling" outside the wall to keep the enemy off (Jgs 9 6). A similar "filling," or revêtment, outside the great wall was found at Kiriath-sepher (Bibliotheca Sacra, Oct 26, 390). To the E. of the city, in a recess at the base of Gerizim, is the sanctuary known as Rijāl el-ʿAmūd, lit. "men of the column" or "pillar," where some would locate the ancient "oak of Moreh" or "of the pillar." Others would find it in a little village farther E. with a fine spring, called Balāṭa, a name which may be connected with ballūṭ, "oak." Still farther to the E. and near the base of Ebal is the traditional tomb of Joseph, a little white-domed building beside a luxuriant orchard. On the slope of the mountain beyond is the village of ʿAskar; see Sychar. To the S. of the vale is the traditional Well of Jacob; see Jacob's Well. To the S.W. of the city is a small mosque on the spot where Jacob is said to have mourned over the blood-stained coat of Joseph. In the neighboring minaret is a stone whereon the Ten Commandments are engraved in Samaritan characters. The main center of interest in the town is the synagogue of the Samaritans, with their ancient MS of the Pent.

3. Modern Shechem

The modern town contains about 20,000 inhabitants, the great body of them being Moslems. There are some 700 or 800 Christians, chiefly belonging to the Gr Orthodox church. The Samaritans do not total more than 200. The place is still the market for a wide district, both E. and W. of Jordan. A considerable trade is done in cotton and wool. Soap is manufactured in large quantities, oil for this purpose being plentifully supplied by the olive groves. Tanning and the manufacture of leather goods are also carried on. In old times the slopes of Ebal were covered with vineyards; but these formed a source of temptation to the "faithful." They were therefore removed by authority, and their place taken by the prickly pears mentioned above.

W. Ewing

SHECHEMITES, shē'kem-īts (הַשִּׁכְמִי, ha-shikhmī; Συχεμεί, Suchemeí): The descendants of Shechem the son of Gilead, a clan of Eastern Manasseh (Nu 26 31; Josh 17 2).

SHED, SHEDDING: The three Heb words, nāghar, sīm or sūm and shāphakh, trd "shed" in many OT passages, always mean a "pouring out," and in nearly every case point to the effusion of blood (Gen 9 6; Nu 35 33; Dt 21 7; 2 S 20 10; 1 Ch 22 8; Prov 1 16, etc). The Gr words ἐκχέω, ekchéō, and ἐκχύνω, ekchúnō, have precisely the same specific meaning (Mt 23 35; 26 28; Mk 14 24; Lk 11 50; He 9 22; Rev 16 6). Sometimes they are tropically used in reference to the outpouring of the Holy Spirit (Acts 2 33 AV; Tit 3 6), and to the outpouring of the love of God in the believer's heart (Rom 5 5).

Henry E. Dosker

SHEDEUR, shed'ē-ur, shē-dē'ur (שְׁדֵיאוּר, shᵉdhē'ūr, "daybreak"; B, Σεδιούρ, Sedioúr, 'Εδιούρ, Edioúr): The father of Elizur, the chief of Reuben (Nu 1 5; 2 10; 7 30). Fr. Delitzsch correctly conceives the name as an Assyr compound, šad uri, "daybreak." Cf, however, Gray, HPN, 169, 197, who emends the text to read Shaddai 'Ūr, "Shaddai is flame."

SHEEP, shēp: The usual Heb word is צֹאן, çō'n, which is often trd "flock," e.g. "Abel . . . . brought of the firstlings of his flock" (Gen 4 4); "butter of the herd, and milk of the flock" (Dt 32 14). AV and ERV have "milk of sheep." Cf Arab. ضَأْن, ḍa'n. The Gr word is πρόβατον, próbaton. For other names, see notes under Cattle; Ewe; Lamb; Ram.

1. Names

2. Zoölogy

The origin of domestic sheep is unknown. There are 11 wild species, the majority of which are found in Asia, and it is conceivable that they may have spread from the highlands of Central Asia to the other portions of their habitat. In North America is found the "bighorn," which is very closely related to a Kamschatkan species. One species, the urial or sha, is found in India. The Barbary sheep, Ovis tragelaphus, also known as the aoudad or arui, inhabits the Atlas Mountains of Northwest Africa. It is thought by Tristram to be zemer, EV "chamois" of Dt 14 5, but there is no good evidence that this animal ranges eastward into Bible lands. Geographically nearest is the Armenian wild sheep, Ovis gmelini, of Asia Minor and Persia. The Cyprian wild sheep may be only a variety of the last, and the mouflon of Corsica and Sardinia is an allied species. It is not easy to draw the line between wild sheep and wild goats. Among the more obvious distinctions are the chin beard and strong odor of male goats. The pelage of all wild sheep consists of hair, not wool, and this indeed is true of some domestic sheep as the fat-rumped short-tailed sheep of Abyssinia and Central Asia. The young lambs of this breed have short curly wool which is the astrachan of commerce. Sheep are geologically recent, their bones and teeth not being found in earlier deposits than the pleiocene or pleistocene. They were, however, among the first of domesticated animals.

3. Sheep of Palestine

The sheep of Syria and Pal are characterized by the possession of an enormous fat tail which weighs many pounds and is known in Arab. as أَلْيَة, 'alyat, or commonly لِيَّة, līyat. This is the אַלְיָה, 'alyāh, "fat tail" (AV "rump") (Ex 29 22; Lev 3 9; 7 3; 8 25; 9 19), which was burned in sacrifice. This is at the present day esteemed a great delicacy. Sheep are kept in large numbers by the Bedawin, but a large portion of the supply of mutton for the cities is from the sheep of Armenia and Kurdistan, of which great droves are brought down to the coast in easy stages. Among the Moslems every well-to-do family sacrifices a sheep at the feast of al-'aḍha', the 10th day of the month dhû-l-ḥijjat, 40 days after the end of ramaḍân, the month of fasting. In Lebanon every peasant family during the summer fattens a young ram, which is literally crammed by one of the women of the household, who keeps the creature's jaw moving with one hand while with the other she stuffs its mouth with vine or mulberry leaves. Every afternoon she washes it at the village fountain. When slaughtered in the fall it is called مَعْلُوف, ma'lûf, "fed," and is very fat and the flesh very tender. Some of the meat and fat are eaten at once, but the greater part, fat and lean, is cut up fine, cooked together in a large vessel with pepper and salt, and stored in an earthen jar. This, the so-called قَوْرَمَة, ḳauramat, is used as needed through the winter.

Broad-tailed Sheep.

In the mountains the sheep are gathered at night into folds, which may be caves or inclosures of rough stones. Fierce dogs assist the shepherd in warding off the attacks of wolves, and remain at the fold through the day to guard the slight bedding and simple utensils. In going to pasture the sheep are not driven but are led, following the shepherd as he walks before them and calls to them. "When he hath put forth all his own, he goeth before them, and the sheep follow him: for they know his voice" (Jn 10 4).

4. OT References

The sheepfolds of Reuben on the plain of Gilead are referred to in Nu 32 16 and Jgs 5 16. A cave is mentioned in 1 S 24 3 in connection with the pursuit of David by Saul. The shepherd origin of David is referred to in Ps 78 70:

"He chose David also his servant,
And took him from the sheepfolds."

Cf also 2 S 7 8 and 1 Ch 17 7.

The shearing of the sheep was a large operation and evidently became a sort of festival. Absalom invited the king's sons to his sheep-shearing in Baal-hazor in order that he might find an opportunity to put Amnon to death while his heart was "merry with wine" (2 S 13 23–29). The character of the occasion is evident also from the indignation of David at Nabal when the latter refused to provide entertainment at his sheep-shearing for David's young men who had previously protected the flocks of Nabal (1 S 25 2–13). There is also mention of the sheep-shearing of Judah (Gen 38 12) and of Laban (Gen 31 19), on which occasion Jacob stole away with his wives and children and his flocks.

Sheep were the most important sacrificial animals, a ram or a young male being often specified. Ewes are mentioned in Lev 3 6; 4 32; 5 6; 14 10; 22 28; Nu 6 14.

In the Books of Ch we find statements of enormous numbers of animals consumed in sacrifice: "And king Solomon offered a sacrifice of twenty and two thousand oxen, and a hundred and twenty thousand sheep" (2 Ch 7 5); "And they sacrificed unto Jeh in that day [in the reign of Asa] . . . . seven hundred oxen and seven thousand sheep" (2 Ch 15 11); at the cleansing of the temple by Hezekiah "the consecrated things were six hundred oxen and three thousand sheep. But the priests were too few, so that they could not flay all the burnt-offerings: wherefore their brethren the Levites did help them" (2 Ch 29 33 f); and "Hezekiah king of Judah did give to the assembly for offerings a thousand bullocks and seven thousand sheep; and the princes gave to the assembly a thousand bullocks and ten thousand sheep" (2 Ch 30 24). In the account of the war of the sons of Reuben and their allies with the Hagrites, we read: "And they took away their cattle; of their camels fifty thousand, and of sheep two hundred and fifty thousand, and of asses two thousand, and of men a hundred thousand" (1 Ch 5 21). Mesha king of Moab is called a "sheep-master," and we read that "he rendered unto the king of Israel the wool of a hundred thousand lambs, and of a hundred thousand rams" (2 K 3 4).

5. Figurative

Christ is represented as the Lamb of God (Isa 53 7; Jn 1 29; Rev 5 6). Some of the most beautiful passages in the Bible represent God as a shepherd: "From thence is the shepherd, the stone of Israel" (Gen 49 24); "Jeh is my shepherd; I shall not want" (Ps 23 1; cf Isa 40 11; Ezk 34 12–16). Jesus said "I am the good shepherd; and I know mine own, and mine own know me . . . . and I lay down my life for the sheep" (Jn 10 14 f). The people without leaders are likened to sheep without a shepherd (Nu 27 17; 1 K 22 17; 2 Ch 18 16; Ezk 34 5). Jesus at the Last Supper applies to Himself the words of Zec 13 7; "I will smite the shepherd, and the sheep of the flock shall be scattered abroad" (Mt 26 31; Mk 14 27). The enemies of Jeh are compared to the fat of the sacrifice that is consumed away in smoke (Ps 37 20). God's people are "the sheep of his pasture" (Ps 79 13; 95 7; 100 3). In sinning they become like lost sheep (Isa 53 6; Jer 50 6; Ezk 34 6; Lk 15 3 ff). In the mouth of Nathan the poor man's one little ewe lamb is a vivid image of the treasure of which the king David has robbed Uriah the Hittite (2 S 12 3). In Cant 6 6, the teeth of the bride are likened to a flock of ewes. It is prophesied that "the wolf shall dwell with the lamb" (Isa 11 6) and that "the wolf and the lamb shall feed together" (Isa 65 25). Jesus says to His disciples, "I send you forth as sheep in the midst of wolves" (Mt 10 16; cf Lk 10 3). In the parable of the Good Shepherd we read: "He that is a hireling, and not a shepherd, whose own the sheep are not, beholdeth the wolf coming, and leaveth the sheep, and fleeth" (Jn 10 12).

SHEEPCOTE, shēp′kot, shēp′kōt, SHEEPFOLD, shēp′fōld (גְּדֵרָה, g^{e}dhērāh, מִכְלָה, mikhlāh, מִשְׁפְּתַיִם, mishp^{e}thayim, נָוֶה, nāweh; αὐλή, aulḗ): At night the sheep are driven into a sheepfold if they are in a district where there is danger from robbers or wild beasts. These folds are simple walled inclosures (Nu 32 16; Jgs 5 16; 2 Ch 32 28; Ps 78 70; Zeph 2 6; Jn 10 1). On the top of the wall is heaped thorny brushwood as a further safeguard. Sometimes there is a covered hut in the corner for the shepherd. Where there is no danger the sheep huddle together in the open until daylight, while the shepherd watches over them (Gen 31 39; Lk 2 8). In the winter time caves are sought after (1 S 24 3; Zeph 2 6). The antiquity of the use of some of the caves for this purpose is indicated by the thick deposit of potassium nitrate formed from the decomposition of the sheep dung.

SHEEP GATE (שַׁעַר הַצֹּאן, sha'ar ha-çō'n [Neh 3 1.32; 12 39]): One of the gates of Jerus, probably near the northeast corner. See Jerusalem. For the "sheep gate" of Jn 5 2, see Bethesda; Sheep Market.

SHEEP MARKET (Jn 5 2, RV "sheep gate"): The Gr (ἡ προβατική, hē probatikḗ) means simply something that pertains to sheep. See Bethesda; Sheep Gate.

SHEEP-MASTER (נֹקֵד, nōḳēdh, "herdsman," 2 K 3 4). See Sheep-shearing.

SHEEP-SHEARING, shēp'shēr-ing: The sheep-shearing is done in the springtime, either by the owners (Gen 31 19; 38 13; Dt 15 19; 1 S 25 2.4) or by regular "shearers" (גָּזַז, gāzaz) (1 S 25 7.11; Isa 53 7). There were special houses for this work in OT times (2 K 10 12.14). The shearing was carefully done so as to keep the fleece whole (Jgs 6 37). The sheep of a flock are not branded but spotted. Lime or some dyestuff is painted in one or more spots on the wool of the back as a distinguishing mark. In 2 K 3 4, Mesha, the chief or sheikh of Moab, was a sheep-master, lit. "a sheep spotter." James A. Patch

SHEEPSKIN, shēp'skin. See Bottle; Dress; Rams' Skins, etc.

SHEEP TENDING, ten'ding: The Scriptural allusions to pastoral life and the similes drawn from that life are the most familiar and revered in the Bible. Among the first verses that a child learns is "The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want" (Ps 23 1 AV, ERV). What follower of the Master does not love to dwell on the words of the "Good Shepherd" chapter in the Gospel of John (Jn 10)? Jesus must have drawn a sympathetic response when He referred to the relationship of sheep to shepherd, a relationship familiar to all His hearers and doubtless shared by some of them with their flocks. As a rule the modern traveler in the Holy Land meets with disappointment if he comes expecting to see things as they were depicted in the Bible. An exception to this is the pastoral life, which has not changed one whit since Abraham and his descendants fed their flocks on the rich plateaus E. of the Jordan or on the mountains of Pal and Syria. One may count among his most prized experiences the days and nights spent under the spell of Syrian shepherd life. James A. Patch

SHEERAH, shē'ė-ra (שְׁאֶרָה, she'ĕrāh; A, Σααρά, Saará, B omits): A daughter of Ephraim, who, according to the MT of 1 Ch 7 24 (AV "Sherah"), built the two Beth-horons and Uzzen-sheerah. The verse has been suspected because elsewhere in the OT the founders of cities are men. Uzzen-sheerah as a place is unidentified; Conder suggests as the site Bēt Sīrā, a village 2 miles S.W. of the Lower Beth-horon (Mem 3 16).

SHEET, shēt. See Dress; cf Acts 10 11, "as it were a great sheet" (ὀθόνη, othónē).

SHEHARIAH, shē-ha-rī'a (שְׁהַרְיָה, shᵉharyāh): A Benjamite (1 Ch 8 26).

SHEKEL, shek''l, shek'el, shē'kel, shē'kul (שֶׁקֶל, sheḳel): A weight and a coin. The Heb shekel was the 50th part of a mina, and as a weight about 224 grains, and as money (silver) was worth about 2*s.* 9*d.*, or 66 cents. No gold shekel has been found, and hence it is inferred that such a coin was not used; but as a certain amount of gold, by weight, it is mentioned in 2 Ch 3 9 and is probably intended to be supplied in 2 K 5 5. The gold shekel was 1/60 of the heavy Bab mina and weighed about 252 grains. In value it was about equal to £2 1*s.* 0*d.*, or $10. See Money; Weights and Measures. In RV of Mt 17 27 "shekel" replaces "piece of money" of AV, the tr of στατήρ, statḗr. See Stater.
H. Porter

SHEKEL OF THE KING'S WEIGHT, or ROYAL SHEKEL (אֶבֶן הַמֶּלֶךְ, 'ebhen ha-melekh, "stone [i.e. weight] of the king"): The shekel by which Absalom's hair was weighed (2 S 14 26), probably the light shekel of 130 grains. See Weights and Measures.

SHEKEL OF THE SANCTUARY, or SACRED SHEKEL (שֶׁקֶל הַקֹּדֶשׁ, sheḳel ha-ḳōdhesh [Nu 7 passim]): The same as the silver shekel mentioned under Shekel (q.v.), except in Ex 38 24, where it is used in measuring gold. The term is used for offerings made for sacred purposes.

SHEKINAH, shė-kī'na (שְׁכִינָה, shᵉkhīnāh, "that which dwells," from the vb. שָׁכֵן, shākhēn, or שָׁכַן, shākhan, "to dwell," "reside"): This word is not found in the Bible, but there are allusions to it in Isa 60 2; Mt 17 5; Lk 2 9; Rom 9 4. It is first found in the Tgs. See Glory.

SHELAH, shē'la (שֵׁלָה, shēlāh; Σάλα, Sála):

(1) The youngest son of Judah and the daughter of Shua the Canaanite (Gen 38 5.11.14.26; 46 12; Nu 26 20 [16]; 1 Ch 2 3; 4 21). He gave his name to the family of the Shelanites (Nu 26 20 [16]). Probably "the Shelanite" should be substituted for "the Shilonite" of Neh 11 5; 1 Ch 9 5.

(2) (שֶׁלַח, shelāḥ): The son or (LXX) grandson of Arpachshad and father of Eber (Gen 10 24; 11 13 [12].14.15; 1 Ch 1 18.24; Lk 3 35).

(3) Neh 3 15="Shiloah" of Isa 8 6. See Siloam.

SHELANITES, shē'lan-īts, shė-lā'nīts. See Shelah.

SHELEMIAH, shel-ė-mī'a, shė-lem'ya (שֶׁלֶמְיָה, shelemyāh; B, Σελεμιά, Selemiá, A, Σελεμίας, Selemías):

(1) One of the sons of Bani who married foreign wives in the time of Ezra (Ezr 10 39), called "Selemias" in 1 Esd 9 34.

(2) Father of Hananiah who restored part of the wall of Jerus (Neh 3 30) (B, Τελεμιά, Telemiá, ℵ, Τελεμίας, Telemías).

(3) A priest who was appointed one of the treasurers to distribute the Levitical tithes by Nehemiah (Neh 13 13).

(4) The father of Jehucal (or Jucal) in the reign of Zedekiah (Jer 37 3; 38 1; in the second passage the name is Shelemyāhū).

(5) The father of Irijah, the captain of the ward, who arrested Jeremiah as a deserter to the Chaldaeans (Jer 37 13).

(6) 1 Ch 26 14. See Meshelemiah.

(7) Another of the sons of Bani who married foreign wives in the time of Ezra (Ezr 10 41). It is of interest to note that the order of names in this passage—Sharai, Azarel, and Shelemiah—is almost identical with the names in Jer 36 26, viz. Seraiah, Azriel, Shelemiah.

(8) Ancestor of Jehudi (Jer 36 14).

(9) (LXX omits.) Son of Abdeel, one of the men sent by Jehoiakim to seize Baruch and Jeremiah after Baruch had read the "roll" in the king's presence (Jer 36 26). Horace J. Wolf

SHELEPH, shē′lef (שָׁלֶף, shāleph, in pause; LXX Σάλεφ, Sáleph): Son of Joktan (Gen 10 26; 1 Ch 1 20). Sheleph is the name of a Yemenite tribe or district, named on Sabaean inscriptions and also by Arabian geographers, located in Southern Arabia.

SHELESH, shē′lesh (שֵׁלֶשׁ, shēlesh; B, Σεμή, Semḗ, A, Σελλής, Sellḗs, Luc., Σέλεμ, Sélem): An Asherite, son of Helem (1 Ch 7 35).

SHELOMI, shē̇-lō′mī, shel′ō̇-mī (שְׁלֹמִי, sh^{e}lōmī): An Asherite (Nu 34 27).

SHELOMITH, shē̇-lō′mith, shel′ō̇-mith (שְׁלֹמִית, sh^{e}lōmīth; in Ezr 8 10, שְׁלוֹמִית, sh^{e}lōmīth):

(1) The mother of the man who was stoned for blasphemy (Lev 24 11) (BAF, Σαλωμεἰθ, Salōmeíth, Luc., Σαλμἰθ, Salmíth).

(2) Daughter of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3 19) (B, Σαλωμεθεἰ, Salōmetheí, A, Σαλωμεθἰ, Salōmethí, Luc., Σαλωμἰθ, Salōmíth).

(3) One of the "sons of Izhar" (1 Ch 23 18) (B, Σαλωμώθ, Salōmṓth, A, Σαλουμώθ, Saloumṓth, Luc., Σαλωμἰθ, Salōmíth), called "Shelomoth" in 24 22.

(4) The name of a family whose representatives returned with Ezra (Ezr 8 10) (B, Σαλειμούθ, Saleimoúth, Luc., Σαλιμώθ, Salimṓth). The MT here should read, "and the sons of Bani; Shelomith, son of Josiphiah"; and in 1 Esd 8 36, "of the sons of Banias, Salimoth, son of Josaphias."

Horace J. Wolf

SHELOMOTH, shē̇-lō′moth, shel′ō̇-moth, -mōth (שְׁלֹמוֹת, sh^{e}lōmōth):

(1) An Izharite (1 Ch 24 22, BA, Σαλωμώθ, Salōmṓth, Luc., Σαλωμἰθ, Salōmíth = "Shelomith" of 23 18).

(2) A Levite descended from Eliezer ben Moses (1 Ch 26 25, Ḳ^{e}rē שְׁלֹמִית, sh^{e}lōmīth; 26 28).

(3) A Gershonite (1 Ch 23 9, Ḳ^{e}rē שְׁלֹמִית; B, 'Αλωθεἰμ, Alōtheím, A, Σαλωμεἰθ, Salōmeíth).

SHELUMIEL, shē̇-lū′mi-el (שְׁלֻמִיאֵל, sh^{e}lumī'ēl; both the punctuation and interpretation are in doubt. MT punctuates the first element as a passive participle; the use of the participle in compounds is common in Assyr but rare in Heb [cf Gray, HPN, 200]. The meaning of the present form, if it be correct, is "at peace with God" [Hommel, AHT, 200, "my friend is God"]. LXX reads Σαλαμιήλ, Salamiḗl): Prince of the tribe of Simeon (Nu 1 6; 2 12; 7 36.41; 10 19). The genealogy of Judith (8 1) is carried back to this Shelumiel or Shelamiel, called there "Salamiel."

1. Position in Noah's Family: His Name

SHEM, shem (שֵׁם, shēm; Σήμ, Sḗm): The eldest son of Noah, from whom the Jews, as well as the Semitic ("Shemitic") nations in general have descended. When giving the names of Noah's three sons, Shem is always mentioned first (Gen 9 18; 10 1, etc); and though "the elder" in "Shem the brother of Japheth the elder" (10 21 m) is explained as referring to Shem, this is not the rendering of Onkelos. His five sons peopled the greater part of West Asia's finest tracts, from Elam on the E. to the Mediterranean on the W. Though generally regarded as meaning "dusky" (cf the Assyr-Bab sâmu—also Ham—possibly = "black," Japheth, "fair"), it is considered possible that Shem may be the usual Heb word for "name" (shēm), given him because he was the firstborn—a parallel to the Assyr-Bab usage, in which "son," "name" (šumu) are synonyms (W. A. Inscriptions, V, pl. 23, ll. 29–32*abc*).

2. History, and the Nations Descended from Him

Shem, who is called "the father of all the children of Eber," was born when Noah had attained the age of 500 years (Gen 5 32). Though married at the time of the Flood, Shem was then childless. Aided by Japheth, he covered the nakedness of their father, which Ham, the youngest brother, had revealed to them; but unlike the last, Shem and Japheth, in their filial piety, approached their father walking backward, in order not to look upon him. Two years after the Flood, Shem being then 100 years old, his son Arpachshad was born (Gen 11 10), and was followed by further sons and daughters during the remaining 500 years which preceded Shem's death. Noah's prophetic blessing, on awakening from his wine, may be regarded as having been fulfilled in his descendants, who occupied Syria (Aram), Pal (Canaan), Chaldaea (Arpachshad), Assyria (Asshur), part of Persia (Elam), and Arabia (Joktan). In the first three of these, as well as in Elam, Canaanites had settled (if not in the other districts mentioned), but Shemites ruled, at some time or other, over the Canaanites, and Canaan thus became "his servant" (Gen 9 25.26). The tablets found in Cappadocia seem to show that Shemites (Assyrians) had settled in that district also, but this was apparently an unimportant colony. Though designated sons of Shem, some of his descendants (e.g. the Elamites) did not speak a Semitic language, while other nationalities, not his descendants (e.g. the Canaanites), did. See Ham; Japheth; Table of Nations.

SHEMA, shē′ma (שְׁמָע, sh^{e}mā'; Σαμαά, Samaá): A city of Judah in the Negeb (Josh 15 26). If, as some think, identical with Sheba (q.v.) of Josh 19 2, then the latter must have been inserted here from Josh 15 26. It is noticeable that the root letters (שמע) were those from which Simeon is derived. Shema is probably identical with Jeshua (Neh 11 26). The place was clearly far S., and it may be Kh. Sa'wah, a ruin upon a prominent hilltop between Kh. 'Attīr and Kh. el-Milḥ. There is a wall around the ruins, of large blocks of conglomerate flint (PEF, III, 409, Sh XXV).

E. W. G. Masterman

SHEMA (שֶׁמַע, shema'):

(1) A Reubenite (1 Ch 5 8, BA, Σάμα, Sáma, Luc., Σεμεεἰ, Semeeí). See Shimei.

(2) One of the heads of "fathers' houses" in Aijalon, who put to flight the inhabitants of Gath (1 Ch 8 13, BA, Σάμα, Sáma, Luc., Σαμαά, Samaá); in ver 21 he is called "Shimei." The statement is very obscure and the whole incident is probably due to some marginal note.

(3) One of those who stood at Ezra's right during the reading of the Law (Neh 8 4, Σαμαἰας, Samaías). He is called "Sammus" in 1 Esd 9 43.

Horace J. Wolf

SHEMAAH, shē̇-mā′a, shem′ȧ-a (הַשְּׁמָעָה, ha-sh^{e}mā'āh; B, 'Αμά, Amá, A, Σαμαά, Samaá, Luc., 'Ασμά, Asmá): A Benjamite, who was the father, according to the MT, of Ahiezer and Joash; but according to the LXX υἱός, huiós = בֵּן (ben) instead of בְּנֵי (b^{e}nē) of Joash alone (1 Ch 12 3). The original text may have read בֶּן יְהוֹשָׁמָע, ben y^{e}hōshāmā' (cf הוֹשָׁמָע, hōshāmā', of 3 18); then a dittography of the following ה (h) caused the error (Curtis, ICC).

SHEMAIAH, shē̇-mā′ya, shē̇-mī′a (שְׁמַעְיָה, sh^{e}ma'yāh [in 2 Ch 11 2; 17 8; 31 15; 35 9; Jer 26 20; 29 24; 36 12, sh^{e}ma'yāhū], "Jahveh hears"):

The name is most frequently borne by priests, Levites and prophets.

(1) B, Σαμμαίας, Sammaías, A, Σαμαίας, Samaías (2 Ch 12 5.7). A prophet who, together with Ahijah, protested against Rehoboam's contemplated war against the ten revolted tribes (1 K 12 22–24 = 2 Ch 11 2–4). He declared that the rebellion had Divine sanction. The second Gr account knows nothing of Ahijah in this connection and introduces Shemaiah at the gathering at Shechem where both Jeroboam and Rehoboam were present; it narrates that on this occasion Shemaiah (not Ahijah) rent his garment and gave ten parts to Jeroboam to signify the ten tribes over which he was to become king. (This version, however, is not taken very seriously, because of its numerous inconsistencies.) Shemaiah also prophesied at the invasion of Judah by Shishak (2 Ch 12 5–7). His message was to the effect that as the princes of Israel had humbled themselves, God's wrath against their idolatrous practices would not be poured out upon Jerus by the hand of Shishak (2 Ch 13 7). He is mentioned as the author of a history of Rehoboam (2 Ch 12 15).

(2) Son of Shecaniah (1 Ch 3 22, Σαμαιά, Samaiá), a descendant of Zerubbabel. This is also the name of one of the men who helped to repair the wall (Neh 3 29, Σεμεία, Semeía [א] [cf Curtis, ICC, in vs 17–24 of 1 Ch 3]).

(3) A Simeonite (1 Ch 4 37, B, Συμεών, Sumeōn, A, Σαμαίας, Samaías), identical, perhaps, with the Shimei of 1 Ch 4 26.27.

(4) A Reubenite (1 Ch 5 4, B, Σεμεεί, Semeeí, A, Σεμείν, Semeín), called Shema in ver 8.

(5) A Merarite Levite (1 Ch 9 14; Neh 11 15, Σαμαιά, Samaiá), one of those who dwelt in Jerus.

(6) A Levite of the family of Jeduthun, father of Obadiah or Abda (1 Ch 9 16, B, Σαμειά, Sameiá, A, Σαμίας, Samías, called "Shammua" in Neh 11 17).

(7) Head of the Levitical Kohathite clan of Elizaphan in the time of David (1 Ch 15 8, B, Σαμαίας, Samaías, A, Σεμαιά, Semaiá, א, Σαμέας, Saméas; ver 11, B, Σαμίας, Samías, A, Σεμείας, Semeías, א, Σαμαί, Samaí). He may be the same person as (8).

(8) The scribe (1 Ch 24 6), the son of Nethanel, who registered the names of the priestly courses.

(9) A Korahite Levite, eldest son of Obed-edom (1 Ch 26 4.6, B, Σαμαίας, Samaías, A, Σαμείας, Sameías; ver 7, B, Σαμαί, Samaí, A, Σεμεία, Semeía).

(10) A Levite (2 Ch 17 8, B, Σαμούας, Samoúas, A, Σαμουίας, Samouías). One of the commission appointed by Jehoshaphat to teach the book of the Law in Judah. The names of the commissioners as a whole belong to a period later than the 9th cent. (Gray, HPN, 231).

(11) One of the men "over the free-will offerings of God" (2 Ch 31 15, Σεμεεί, Semeeí).

(12) A Levite of the family of Jeduthun in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Ch 29 14), one of those who assisted in the purification of the Temple.

(13) A chief of the Levites (2 Ch 35 9), called "Samaias" in LXX and 1 Esd 1 9.

(14) A "chief man" under Ezra (Ezr 8 16), called "Maasmas" and "Samaias" in 1 Esd 8 43.44.

(15) A member of the family of Adonikam (Ezr 8 13, B, Σαμαία, Samaía, A, Σαμαειά, Samaeiá; "Samaias" in 1 Esd 8 39).

(16) A priest of the family of Harim who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 21), called "Sameus" in 1 Esd 9 21.

(17) A layman of the family of Harim who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 31), called "Sabbeus" in 1 Esd 9 32.

(18) A prophet (Neh 6 10–14, B, Σεμεεί, Semeeí, A, Σεμεί, Semeí), employed by Sanballat and Tobiah to frighten Nehemiah and hinder the rebuilding of the wall.

(19) One of the 24 courses of priests, 16th under Zerubbabel (Neh 12 6, א A, Σεμείας, Semeías), 15th under Joiakim (Neh 12 18, א A, Σεμεία, Semeía), and 21st under Nehemiah (Neh 10 8, Σαμαιά, Samaiá), mentioned in connection with the dedication of the wall.

(20) A priest, descendant of Asaph (Neh 12 35).

(21) A singer (or clan) participating in the dedication of the wall (Neh 12 36).

(22) Father of the prophet Urijah (Jer 26 20, B A, Σαμαίας, Samaías, א, Μασέας, Maséas).

(23) A false prophet who was upbraided by Jeremiah (29 24–32) for attempting to hinder his work. He is styled "the Nehelamite" and was among those carried into captivity with Jehoiachin. In opposition to Jeremiah, he predicted a speedy ending to the captivity. Jeremiah foretold the complete destruction of Shemaiah's family.

(24) Father of Delaiah, who was a prince in the reign of Zedekiah (Jer 36 12).

(25) "The great," kinsman of Tobias (Tob 5 13).

SHEMARIAH, shem-a-rī'a, shē̇-mär'ya (שְׁמַרְיָה, shᵉmaryāh and שְׁמַרְיָהוּ, shᵉmaryāhū, "whom Jahveh guards"):

(1) A Benjamite warrior who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12 5, B, Σαμμαραιά, Sammaraiá, א A, Σαμαριά, Samariá, Luc., Σαμαρίας, Samarías).

(2) A son of Rehoboam (2 Ch 11 19).

(3) One of the sons of Harim who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 32, B, Σαμαρειά, Samareiá, Luc., Σαμαρίας, Samarías, א A, Σεμαριά, Semariá).

(4) One of the sons of Bani who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 41, A, Σαμαρείας, Samareías, B, Σαμαρειά, Samareiá, Luc., Σαμαρίας, Samarías).

SHEMEBER, shem-ē'bẽr, shem'ē̇-bẽr (שֶׁמְאֵבֶר, shem'ēbher): The king of Zeboiim (Gen 14 2). See Shinab.

SHEMED, shē'med. See Shemer, (4).

SHEMER, shē'mẽr (שֶׁמֶר, shemer; Σέμηρ, Sémēr, Luc., Σέμμηρ, Sémmēr):

(1) The owner of the hill which Omri bought and which became the site of Samaria (1 K 16 24, שֹׁמְרוֹן, shōmᵉrōn). Shemer may be an ancient clan name. The fact, however, that the mountain was called Shomeron when Omri bought it makes one doubt that the city of Samaria was named after Shemer; the passage is questionable. The real etymology of Samaria roots it in "watch mountain" (see Stade, Zeitschrift, 165 f).

(2) A Merarite (1 Ch 6 46 [31], Σέμμηρ, Sémmēr).

(3) An Asherite (1 Ch 7 34, A and Luc., Σώμηρ, Sṓmēr), called "Shomer" in ver 32.

(4) A Benjamite (1 Ch 8 12, B, Σήμηρ, Sḗmēr; A, Σέμμηρ, Sémmēr, Luc., Σαμαιήλ, Samaiḗl); RV "Shemed," AV "Shamed."

The Heb MSS differ; some read "Shemer," others "Shemedh."

SHEMIDA, SHEMIDAH, shē̇-mī'da, SHEMIDAITES, shē̇-mī'da-īts (שְׁמִידָע, shᵉmīdhā'): A Gileadite clan belonging to Manasseh (Nu 26 32; Josh 17 2, B, Συμαρείμ, Sumareím, A, Σεμιραέ, Semiraé, Luc., Σαμιδάε, Samidáe; 1 Ch 7 19, AV "Shemidah," after whom the Shemidaites [Nu 26 32] were called).

SHEMINITH, shem'i-nith. See Music; Psalms.

SHEMIRAMOTH, shḗ-mir′a-moth, shḗ-mī′ra-mōth, shem-i-rā′mōth (שְׁמִירָמוֹת, sh^{e}mīrāmōth; in 2 Ch 17 8, K^{e}thībh שמרימות; Σεμειραμώθ, Semeiramṓth): The name of a Levitical family. In 1 Ch 15 18.20; 16 5 Shemiramoth is listed among the names of David's choirs; in 2 Ch 17 8 the same name is given among the Levites delegated by Jehoshaphat to teach the Law in the cities of Judah. According to Schrader (KAT [2], 366) the name is to be identified with the Assyr Sammuramat; the latter occurs as a woman's name on the monuments, more esp. on the statues of Nebo from Nimrod. Another suggestion is that Shemiramoth was originally a place-name meaning "image of Shemiram" (=name of Ram or "the Exalted One").

SHEMITES, shem′īts. See Semites.

SHEMUEL, shḗ-mū′el, shem′ū-el (שְׁמוּאֵל, sh^{e}mū′ēl, "name of God" [?] [1 Ch 6 33 (18)]; RV Samuel, the prophet [see Samuel]; cf Gray, HPN, 200, n. 3):

(1) The Simeonite appointed to assist in the division of the land (Nu 34 20). The MT should be emended to שְׁלֻמִיאֵל, sh^{e}lumī′ēl, to correspond with the form found in 1 6; 2 12; 7 36.41; 10 19. LXX has uniformly Σαλαμιήλ, Salamiḗl.

(2) Grandson of Issachar (1 Ch 7 2) (B, Ἰσαμουήλ, Isamouḗl, A and Luc., Σαμουήλ, Samouḗl).

SHEN, shen (הַשֵּׁן, ha-shēn, "the tooth" or "peak"; τῆς παλαιᾶς, tḗs palaiás): A place named only in 1 S 7 12 to indicate the position of the stone set up by Samuel in connection with the victory over the Philis, "between Mizpah and Shen." LXX evidently read yāshān, "old." Probably we should here read y^{e}shānāh, as in 2 Ch 13 19 (OHL, s.v.). Then it may be represented by ʽAin Sīnia, to the N. of Beitīn.

SHENAZAR, shḗ-nā′zar: AV=RV Shenazzar (q.v.).

SHENAZZAR, shḗ-naz′är (שֶׁנְאַצַּר, shen′aççar): A son of Jeconiah (Jehoiachin) and uncle of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3 18, B A, Σάνεσαρ, Sánesar, Luc., Σάνασαρ, Sánasar, Vulg Sennaser, Senneser). It is highly probable that Sheshbazzar (Ezr 1 8.11), "the prince of Judah," and Shenazzar are identical (so Meyer, Rothstein, etc). The name is difficult; some suggest a corruption of שושבלאצר, shūshbalaççar, and as equivalent to Sin-usur, "Sin [the moon-god] protect."

SHENIR, shē′nēr (שְׂנִיר, s^{e}nīr, שְׁנִיר, sh^{e}nīr): Only found in Cant 4 8 (MT). See Senir.

SHEOL, shē′ōl (שְׁאוֹל, sh^{e}′ōl):

1. The Name
2. The Abode of the Dead
   (1) Not a State of Unconsciousness
   (2) Not Removed from God's Jurisdiction
   (3) Relation to Immortality
3. Post-canonical Period

1. The Name

This word is often tr^{d} in AV "grave" (e.g. Gen 37 35; 1 S 2 6; Job 7 9; 14 13; Ps 6 5; 49 14; Isa 14 11, etc) or "hell" (e.g. Dt 32 22; Ps 9 17; 18 5; Isa 14 9; Am 9 2, etc); in 3 places by "pit" (Nu 16 30.33; Job 17 16). It means really the unseen world, the state or abode of the dead, and is the equivalent of the Gr Háidēs, by which word it is tr^{d} in LXX. The Eng. Revisers have acted somewhat inconsistently in leaving "grave" or "pit" in the historical books and putting "Sheol" in the margin, while substituting "Sheol" in the poetical writings, and putting "grave" in the margin ("hell" is retained in Isa 14). Cf their "Preface." The American Revisers more properly use "Sheol" throughout. The etymology of the word is uncertain. A favorite derivation is from shā′al, "to ask" (cf Prov 1 12; 27 20; 30 15.16; Isa 5 14; Hab 2 5); others prefer the √ shā′al, "to be hollow." The Babylonians are said to have a similar word Sualu, though this is questioned by some.

2. Abode of the Dead

Into Sheol, when life is ended, the dead are gathered in their tribes and families. Hence the expression frequently occurring in the Pent, "to be gathered to one's people," "to go to one's fathers," etc (Gen 15 15; 25 8.17; 49 33; Nu 20 24.28; 31 2; Dt 32 50; 34 5). It is figured as an underworld (Isa 44 23; Ezk 26 20, etc), and is described by other terms, as "the pit" (Job 33 24; Ps 28 1; 30 3; Prov 1 12; Isa 38 18, etc), Abaddon (q.v.) or Destruction (Job 26 6; 28 22; Prov 15 11), the place of "silence" (Ps 94 17; 115 17), "the land of darkness and the shadow of death" (Job 10 21 f). It is, as the antithesis of the living condition, the synonym for everything that is gloomy, inert, insubstantial (the abode of Rephaim, "shades," Job 26 5; Prov 2 18; 21 16; Isa 14 9; 26 14). It is a "land of forgetfulness," where God's "wonders" are unknown (Ps 88 10–12). There is no remembrance or praise of God (Ps 6 5; 88 12; 115 17, etc). In its darkness, stillness, powerlessness, lack of knowledge and inactivity, it is a true abode of death (see Death); hence is regarded by the living with shrinking, horror and dismay (Ps 39 13; Isa 38 17–19), though to the weary and troubled it may present the aspect of a welcome rest or sleep (Job 3 17–22; 14 12 f). The Gr idea of Hades was not dissimilar.

(1) Not a state of unconsciousness.—Yet it would be a mistake to infer, because of these strong and sometimes poetically heightened contrasts to the world of the living, that Sheol was conceived of as absolutely a place without consciousness, or some dim remembrance of the world above. This is not the case. Necromancy rested on the idea that there was some communication between the world above and the world below (Dt 18 11); a Samuel could be summoned from the dead (1 S 28 11–15); Sheol from beneath was stirred at the descent of the king of Babylon (Isa 14 9 ff). The state is rather that of slumbrous semi-consciousness and enfeebled existence from which in a partial way the spirit might temporarily be aroused. Such conceptions, it need hardly be said, did not rest on revelation, but were rather the natural ideas formed of the future state, in contrast with life in the body, in the absence of revelation.

(2) Not removed from God's jurisdiction.—It would be yet more erroneous to speak with Dr. Charles (Eschatology, 35 ff) of Sheol as a region "quite independent of Yahwe, and outside the sphere of His rule." "Sheol is naked before God," says Job, "and Abaddon hath no covering" (26 6). "If I make my bed in Sheol," says the Psalmist, "behold thou art there" (Ps 139 8). The wrath of Jeh burns unto the lowest Sheol (Dt 32 22). As a rule there is little sense of moral distinctions in the OT representations of Sheol, yet possibly these are not altogether wanting (on the above and others points in the theology of Sheol, see Eschatology of the OT).

(3) Relation to immortality.—To apprehend fully the OT conception of Sheol one must view it in its relation to the idea of death as something unnatural and abnormal for man; a result of sin. The believer's hope for the future, so far as this had place, was not prolonged existence in Sheol, but deliverance from it and restoration to new life in God's presence (Job 14 13–15; 19 25–27; Ps 16 10.11; 17 15; 49 15; 73 24–26; see IMMORTALITY; ESCHATOLOGY OF THE OT; RESURRECTION). Dr. Charles probably goes too far in thinking of Sheol in Pss 49 and 73 as "the future abode of the wicked only; heaven as that of the righteous" (op. cit., 74); but different destinies are clearly indicated.

3. Post-canonical Period

There is no doubt, at all events, that in the post-canonical Jewish lit. (Apoc and apocalyptic) a very considerable development is manifest in the idea of Sheol. Distinction between good and bad in Israel is emphasized; Sheol becomes for certain classes an intermediate state between death and resurrection; for the wicked and for Gentiles it is nearly a synonym for Gehenna (hell). For the various views, with relevant lit. on the whole subject, see ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT; also DEATH; HADES; HELL, etc. JAMES ORR

SHEPHAM, shē′fam (שְׁפָם, shᵉphām; Σεπφάμαρ, Sepphámar): A place, probably a hill town, on the ideal eastern boundary of Israel, named in Nu 34 10, but omitted in Ezk 47 15–18. It lay between Hazar-enan and Harbel (MT "Hariblah"), which must have been in the neighborhood of Hermon. The word means a "naked" place, and doubtless indicates one of the barer midway ridges of Anti-Lebanon. It was probably the native place of Zabdi the Shiphmite, who was David's chief vine-gardener (1 Ch 27 27).

SHEPHATIAH, shef-a-tī′a, shḗ-fat′ya (שְׁפַטְיָה, shᵉphaṭyāh, "Jeh has judged"):

(1) A son of David, by Abital (2 S 3 4; 1 Ch 3 3).

(2) A Benjamite, father of Meshullam, of Jerus (1 Ch 9 8).

(3) A Benjamite, who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12 5).

(4) A prince of the Simeonites in the time of David (1 Ch 27 16).

(5) A son of King Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 21 2).

(6) A family, 372 of whom returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 4; Neh 7 9); 80 more males of this family, with their head, returned with Ezra (Ezr 8 8).

(7) A servant of Solomon, 392 of whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 57 f; Neh 7 59 f); "Saphat" in 1 Esd 5 9 and "Saphatias" in 1 Esd 8 34.

(8) A Perezzite (Judahite), some of whose descendants dwelt at Jerus in the time of Nehemiah (Neh 11 4).

(9) A son of Mattan, a contemporary of Jeremiah (Jer 38 1). JAMES ORR

1. Name and References

SHEPHELAH, shef-ē′lä (הַשְּׁפֵלָה, ha-shᵉphēlāh; σεφηλά, sephēlá, σαφηλά, saphēlá): The word denotes "lowland," and is variously rendered in AV. It is "vale" in Dt 1 7; Josh 10 40; 1 K 10 27; 2 Ch 1 15; Jer 33 13; "valley" in Josh 9 1; 11 2.16; 12 8; 15 33; Jgs 1 9; Jer 32 44; "low plain" in 1 Ch 27 28; 2 Ch 9 27; "plain" in Jer 17 26; Ob ver 19; Zec 7 7; and "low country" in 2 Ch 28 18. RV renders uniformly "lowland." As the word always occurs with the definite art., indicating a distinct district, it might have been well to retain it without tr. The boundaries of the district are clearly marked and include much broken country; the hills being low compared with the mountains to the E., but much higher than the plain that runs to the shore. If a tr was to be made, perhaps "lowlands" would have been the best, as applied to the "Lowlands" of Scotland, "which likewise are not entirely plain, but have their groups and ranges of hills" (HGHL, 203). In the wide sense the Shephelah included the territory originally given to the tribe of Dan, and also a considerable part of Western and Southwestern Judaea. At an early day the tribes of Dan and Simeon were practically absorbed by Judah, and hence we find in Josh 15 many cities in the Shephelah which belonged to that tribe (LB, I, 211).

2. Districts and Features

(1) The sites of many ancient cities named in the Shephelah have been identified. They all lie within the strip of hill country that runs along the western base of the mountains of Judah, terminating in the N. at the Valley of Aijalon. Once indeed the name appears to apply to the low hills N. of this (Josh 11 16, 'the mount of Israel and its Shephelah'). Every other reference applies only to the S.

Principal G. A. Smith has pointed out the difference between the district to the N. and that to the S. of Aijalon (HGHL, 203 ff). "North of Ajalon the low hills which run out on Sharon are connected with the high mountains behind them. You ascend to the latter from Sharon either by long sloping ridges, such as that which today carries the telegraph wire and the high road from Jaffa to Nāblus; or else you climb up terraces, such as the succession of ranges closely built upon one another by which the country rises from Lydda to Bethel. That is, the low hills west of Samaria are (to use the Heb phrase) 'ăshēdhōth, or slopes of the central range, and not a separate group. But S. of Ajalon the low hills do not so hang upon the Central Range, but are separated from the mountains of Judah by a series of valleys, both wide and narrow, which run all the way from Ajalon to near Beersheba; and it is only when the low hills are thus flung off the Central Range into an independent group, separating Judaea from Philistia, that the name Shephelah seems to be applied to them."

(2) On the E. of the Shephelah, then, taking the name in this more limited sense, rises the steep wall of the mountain, into which access is gained only by narrow and difficult defiles. The hills of the Shephelah are from 500 to 800 ft. high, with nothing over 1,500. The formation is soft limestone. In the valleys and upland plains there is much excellent land which supports a fairly good population still. Wheat, barley and olives are the chief products. But ancient wine presses cut in the rocks testify to the culture of the vine in old times. The district is almost entirely dependent on the rain for its water-supply. This is collected in great cisterns, partly natural. The rocks are in many places honeycombed with caves.

The western boundary is not so definite as that on the E. Some have held that it included the Phili plain. This contention draws support from the mention of the Phili cities immediately after those of Judah, which are said to be in the Shephelah (Josh 15 45 ff; these verses can hardly be ruled out as of a later date). On the other hand the Philis are said to have invaded the cities of the Shephelah (2 Ch 28 18), which implies that it was outside their country. In later times the Talm (Jerus Shᵉbhī'īth 9 2) distinguishes the Mountain, the Shephelah, and the Plain. See, however, discussion in Buhl (GAP, 104, n.; and G. A. Smith, Expos, 1896, 404 ff).

3. The Five Valleys

The Shephelah is crossed by five wide valleys which furnish easy access from the plain. These are of importance chiefly because from each of them a way, crossing the "foss," enters one of the defiles by which alone armies could approach the uplands of Judaea. The hills of Judaea are much steeper on the east than on the west, where they fall toward Philistia in long-rolling hills, forming the Shephelah.

(1) The most noteworthy of these is the Vale of Aijalon. It winds its way first in a northeasterly direction, past the Beth-horons, then, turning to the S.E., it reaches the plateau at el-Jīb, the ancient Gibeon, fully 5 miles N.W. of Jerus. This is the easiest of all the avenues leading from the plain to the heights, and it is the one along which the tides of battle most frequently rolled from the days of Joshua (Josh 10 12) to those of the Maccabees (1 Macc 3 16 ff, etc). It occupies also a prominent place in the records of the Crusades.

(2) Wâdy eṣ-Ṣurār, the Valley of Sorek, crosses the Shephelah S. of Gezer, and pursues a tortuous course past Beth-shemesh and Kiriath-jearim to the plateau S.W. of Jerus. This is the line followed by the Jaffa-Jerus Railway.

(3) Wâdy es-Sunṭ runs eastward from the N. of Tell eṣ-Ṣāfieh (Gath) up the Vale of Elah to its confluence with Wâdy eṣ-Ṣur which comes in from the S. near Khirbet Shuweikeh (Socoh); and from that point, as Wâdy el-Jindy, pursues its way S. of Timnah to the uplands W. of Bethlehem.

(4) Wâdy el-'Afranj crosses the plain from Ashdod (Esdud), passes Beit Jibrīn (Eleutheropolis), and winds up through the mountains toward Hebron.

(5) Wâdy el-Ḥesy, from the sea about 7 miles N. of Gaza, runs eastward with many windings, passes to the N. of Lachish, and finds its way to the plateau some 6 miles S.W. of Hebron.

Shepherd and Sheep.

From the Shephelah thus opened the gateways by which Judaea and Jerus might be assailed: and the course of these avenues determined the course of much of the history. It is evident that the Shephelah lay open to attack from both sides, and for centuries it was the debatable land between Israel and the Philis. The ark for a time sojourned in this region (1 S 5 6 f). In this district is laid the scene of Samson's exploits (Jgs 14–16). The scene of David's memorable victory over the giant was in the Wâdy eṣ-Sunṭ, between Socoh and Azekah (1 S 17 1). David found refuge here in the cave of Adullam (1 S 22 1). For picturesque and vivid accounts of the Shephelah and of the part it played in history see Smith, HGHL, 201 ff; A. Henderson, Palestine, Its Historical Geography, 1894. W. Ewing

SHEPHER, shē′fẽr (שֶׁפֶר, shepher, "beauty"): A mount near which the Israelites encamped (Nu 33 23 f). See Wanderings of Israel.

SHEPHERD, shep′ẽrd (רֹעֶה, rō'eh, רֹעִי, rō'ī; ποιμήν, poimēn, "a feeder"): The sheep owner frequently tends the flocks himself (Gen 4 4; 30 40; cf Ezk 34 12), but more often he delegates the work to his children (Gen 29 9; 1 S 16 19; 17 15) or relatives (Gen 31 6). In such cases the sheep have good care because the keepers have a personal interest in the well-being of the animals, but when they are attended by a hireling (1 S 17 20) the flocks may be neglected or abused (Isa 56 10.11; Ezk 34 8.10; Zec 11 15.17; Jn 10 12). The chief care of the shepherd is to see that the sheep find plenty to eat and drink. The flocks are not fed in pens or folds, but, summer and winter, must depend upon foraging for their sustenance (Ps 23 2). In the winter of 1910–11 an unprecedented storm ravaged Northern Syria. It was accompanied by a snowfall of more than 3 ft., which covered the ground for weeks. During that time, hundreds of thousands of sheep and goats perished, not so much from the cold as from the fact that they could get no food. Goats hunt out the best feeding-grounds, but sheep are more helpless and have to be led to their food (cf Nu 27 16.17); nor do they possess the instinct of many other animals for finding their way home (cf Ezk 34 6–8). Flocks should be watered at least once a day. Where there are springs or streams this is an easy matter. Frequently the nearest water is hours away. One needs to travel in the dry places in Syria or Pal, and then enter the watered valleys like those in Edom where the flocks are constantly being led for water, to appreciate the Psalmist's words, "He leadeth me beside still waters." Sometimes water can be obtained by digging shallow wells (Gen 26 18–22. 25.32). The shepherd frequently carries with him a pail from which the sheep can drink when the water is not accessible to them. On the mountain tops the melting snows supply the needed water. In other districts it is drawn from deep wells (Gen 29 2; Jn 4 6). The usual time for watering is at noon, at which time the flocks are led to the watering-places (Gen 29 2.3). After drinking, the animals lie down or huddle together in the shade of a rock while the shepherd sleeps. At the first sound of his call, which is usually a peculiar guttural sound, hard to imitate, the flock follow off to new feeding-grounds. Even should two shepherds call their flocks at the same time and the sheep be intermingled, they never mistake their own master's voice (Jn 10 3–5).

The shepherd's equipment is a simple one. His chief garment is a cloak woven from wool or made from sheepskins. This is sleeveless, and so made that it hangs like a cloak on his shoulders. When he sleeps he curls up under it, head and all. During the summer a lighter, short-sleeved ‘aba or coat is worn. He carries a staff or club (see Staff), and a characteristic attitude is to make a rest for his arms by placing his staff on his shoulders against the back of his neck. When an esp. productive spot is found, the shepherd may pass the time, while the animals are grazing, by playing on his pipe (Jgs 5 16). He sometimes carries a sling (קֶלַע, ḳela‘) of goat's hair (1 S 17 40). His chief belongings are kept in a skin pouch or bag (כְּלִי, k^elī) (1 S 17 40). This bag is usually a whole tawed skin turned wrong side out, with the legs tied up and the neck forming the opening. He is usually aided in the keeping and the defending of the sheep by a dog (Job 30 1). In Syria the Kurdish dogs make the best protectors of the sheep, as, unlike the cowardly city dogs, they are fearless and will drive away the wild beasts. The shepherd is often called upon to aid the dogs in defending the sheep (Gen 31 39; 1 S 17 34.35; Isa 31 4; Jer 5 6; Am 3 12).

Figurative: The frequent use of the word "shepherd" to indicate a spiritual overseer is familiar to Bible readers (Ps 23 1; 80 1; Eccl 12 11; Isa 40 4; 63 14; Jer 31 10; Ezk 34 23; 37 24; Jn 21 15–17; Eph 4 11; 1 Pet 5 1–4). We still use the term "pastor," lit. "a shepherd." Leaders in temporal affairs were also called shepherds (Gen 47 17 m; Isa 44 28; 63 11). "Sheep without a shepherd" typified individuals or nations who had forgotten Jeh (Nu 27 17; 1 K 22 17; 2 Ch 18 16; Ezk 34 5.8; Zec 10 2; Mt 9 36; Mk 6 34).

Jesus is spoken of as the good shepherd (Jn 10 14); chief shepherd (1 Pet 5 4); great shepherd (He 13 20); the one shepherd (Jn 10 16). "He will feed his flock like a shepherd, he will gather the lambs in his arm, and carry them in his bosom, and will gently lead those that have their young" (Isa 40 11) is a picture drawn from pastoral life of Jeh's care over His children. A strong sympathy for helpless animals, though sometimes misdirected, is a marked characteristic of the people of Bible lands. The birth of offspring in a flock often occurs far off on the mountain side. The shepherd solicitously guards the mother during her helpless moments and picks up the lamb and carries it to the fold. For the few days, until it is able to walk, he may carry it in his arms or in the loose folds of his coat above his girdle. See also Sheep.

SHEPHI, shē′fī, SHEPHO, shē′fō (שְׁפִי, sh^ephī; B, Σώβ, Sōb, A, Σωφάρ, Sōphár, Luc., Σαπφεί, Sappheí [1 Ch 1 40]; or Shepho, שְׁפוֹ, sh^ephō; A, Σώφ, Sōph, Luc., Σωφάν, Sōphán [Gen 36 23]): A Horite chief.

SHEPHUPHAM, SHEPHUPHAN, shē̇-fū′fam or -fan (שְׁפוּפָם, sh^ephūphām; BA, Σωφάν, Sōphán, Luc., Σοφάν, Sophán [Nu 26 39 (43)]; or Shephuphan, שְׁפוּפָן, sh^ephūphān; B, Σωφαρφάκ, Sōpharphák, A, Σωφάν, Sōphán, Luc., Σεπφάμ, Sepphám [1 Ch 8 5], "a kind of serpent," Gray, HPN, 95): Eponym of a Benjamite family. The name occurs in Gen 46 21 as "Muppim" and in 1 Ch 7 12.15; 26 16 as "Shuppim." It is almost impossible to arrive at the original form; the gentilic "Shuphamites" appears in Nu 26 39 (43).

SHERAH, shē′ra. See Sheerah.

SHERD, shûrd. See Potsherd.

SHEREBIAH, sher-ē̇-bī′a, shē̇-reb′ya (שֵׁרֵבְיָה, shērēbhyah, "God has sent burning heat"[?]; the form is doubtful): A post-exilic priest and family. Sherebiah, who joined Ezra at the river Ahava (Ezr 8 18; LXX omits), and had charge, along with eleven others, of the silver and gold and vessels for the Temple (ver 24, BA, Σαραιά, Saraiá, Luc., Σαραβίας, Sarabías). He aided in the exposition of the Law (Neh 8 7), was among those who made public confession (9 4) and sealed the covenant (10 12 [13]). His name also appears in 12 8.24. In every passage listed above except 10 12 (13), BA read Σαραβία, Sarabía, Luc., Σαραβίας, Sarabías. In 1 Esd 8 47 the name appears as "Asebebia," RV "Asebebias"; in ver 54, "Esebrias," RV "Eserebias," and 1 Esd 9 48, "Sarabias." Many of the companion-names on the lists are plainly ethnic (Cheyne).

SHERESH, shē′resh (שֶׁרֶשׁ, shāresh; B, Σοῦρος, Soúros, A, Σόρος, Sóros, Luc., Φάρες, Phāres, Φόρος, Phóros): A Machirite name in a genealogy of Manasseh (1 Ch 7 16).

SHERGHAT, shûr′gat, sher′gat, or ASSHUR, or ASSUR: The name of the first capital city of Assyria is known by the Arabs as Ḳala’at Sherghat, or the Fortress of Sherghat. Its ancient name was Asshur or Assur (Gen 10 11 m). From it was derived the name of the country, Assyria, and of the people, Assyrians. The date of the founding of the city is not known. Apparently about 2000 BC a colony of Babylonians migrated northward along the Tigris River and settled upon the right shore about halfway between the Upper and Lower Zab, or halfway between the modern cities of Mosul and Bagdad. Assur, the local deity of the place, became the national god of Assyria. It is uncertain whether the deity gave the name to the city, or the city to the deity, but probably an early shrine of Assur stood there, and the people, building their city about it, became known as the Assyrians. At first the city was a Bab dependency, governed by priests from Babylonia. In time, as the city acquired a political significance, the power of the priesthood declined; allegiance to Babylonia ceased, and the Assyr empire came into existence. About 1200 BC the political power had so increased that a new capital, Nimrud (Calah) was built to the N. near the junction of the Upper Zab with the Tigris. In 722 BC the capital was transferred by Sargon to his new city, Dur-Sharrukin, and in 705 BC Sennacherib enlarged Nineveh, and it remained the capital city till the fall of the empire in 606 BC. Assur, however, as the seat of the national deity, never ceased to be the chief religious center.

The mounds of Assur are among the largest in Mesopotamia. They rise abruptly from the Tigris, which they follow for about half a mile, and extend a quarter of a mile inland. In the surrounding plain are other mounds, marking the sites of temples, and indicating that a part of the city was without the walls. At the northern end the mounds are surmounted by a high conical peak, which represents the tower or ziggurat of the temple of Assur.

Of the early excavators Layard and Rassam examined the ruins, but the fanaticism of the surrounding Arabs prevented extensive excavations. In 1904 Dr. W. Andrae, for the Deutsche Orient-gesellschaft, began the systematic excavations which have been continued by Dr. P. Maresch for ten years. Discoveries of the greatest importance have been made. The city was found to have been surrounded on the land side by a double wall. The space between the walls, several rods in width, was occupied by houses, possibly the homes of the soldiers. The base of the outer wall was of stone; above it were mud bricks strengthened at intervals with courses of burned bricks. Along the outer upper edge was a parapet, protected by battlements. From the floor of the parapet small holes were bored vertically downward, so that the soldiers, without exposing themselves, might discharge their arrows at the enemy close to the base of the wall. Many of the holes are still visible. The wall was pierced with several gateways; the names "Gate of Assur," "Gate of the Tigris," "Gate of the Sun God" have survived. At the sides of the gateways were small chambers for the guards, and from them passageways led to the parapet above. The gates were reached by bridges which spanned the moat. Along the river side the city was protected by a high steep embankment, which was built partly of limestone, but chiefly of square bricks laid in bitumen.

Loopholes through Which Arrows Were Shot.

The temple of Assur at the northern end of the city has been thoroughly excavated. With its outer and inner court and tower it conformed in its general plan to the older Bab temples. Several of the palaces of the early kings were discovered, but the best-preserved of the palaces was one which the excavators have called the residence of the mayor. It stood near the western edge of the city on the main street which ran from the western gate to the Tigris. It consisted of two courts surrounded by chambers. Grooves in the paved floor conducted fresh water to the kitchen, the baths and the chambers, and round tiles beneath the floor carried away the waste water to the arched city sewer and to the Tigris. To the rear of the mayor's house was a crowded residential quarter. The streets were very narrow and winding. The houses were exceedingly small; in some of them one could not lie at full length upon the floor. Among their ruins appeared little but stone mortars and broken pottery and other essential household implements.

Near the southern end of the city a most remarkable discovery was made. About a hundred monoliths, from 4 to 8 ft. high, were found still standing erect. On the side of each one, near the top, was an inscription of several lines, dedicating the stone to some individual who had been of great service to the state. They were not tombstones; apparently they had been erected during the lifetime of the people whom they honored. Of the greatest interest was one which bore the name of Sammuramat or Semiramis, the once supposed mythical queen of Nineveh. Its tr reads: "The column of Sa-am-mu-ra-mat, the palace wife of Samsi-Adad, king of the world, king of Assyria, the mother of Adad-Nirari, king of the world, king of Assyria, the . . . . of Shalmaneser, king of the four regions." The inscription not only makes Semiramis a historical character, but places her among the foremost rulers of Assyria.

Monuments in Assur Discovered by the Germans.

The tombs of the kings and nobles were found deep in the ruins in the very center of the city. They were rectangular structures of cut stone, covered above with a rounded arch of burned bricks. In some cases the massive stone doors still turned in their sockets. The roofs of many of them had fallen in; others, which were intact, were filled with dust. From the tombs a vast amount of silver, gold and copper jewelry and stone beads and ornaments were recovered.

One of the chief temples of the city stood at a short distance without the eastern wall. Nothing but its foundations remain. However, the temple was surrounded by a park, traces of which still exist. The soil of the surrounding plain is a hard clay, incapable of supporting vegetable life. Into the clay large holes, several feet in diameter, were dug and filled with loam. Long lines of the holes may still be traced, each marking the spot where a tree, probably the date palm, stood in the temple park.

A modern cemetery on the summit of the main mound is still used by the neighboring Arabs, and therefore it will likely prevent the complete excavation of this oldest of the capital cities of Assyria. See further ASSYRIA. E. J. BANKS

SHERIFF, sher'if (Aram. תִּפְתָּיֵא, tiphtāyē', "judicial," "a lawyer," "a sheriff" [Dnl 3 2 f]): Probably a "lawyer" or "jurist" whose business it was to decide points of law. At best, however, the tr "sheriff" is but a conjecture.

SHESHACH, shē'shak (שֵׁשַׁךְ, shēshakh, as if "humiliation"; cf שָׁכַךְ, shākhakh, "to crouch"): The general explanation is that this is "a cypher-form of 'Bābel' (Babylon)" which is the word given as equivalent to "Sheshach" by the Tg (Jer 25 26; 51 41; LXX omits in both passages). By the device known as Atbaš (אתבשׁ), i.e. disguising a name by substituting the last letter of the alphabet for the first, the letter next to the last for the second, etc, ששך is substituted for בָּבֶל, bābhel. This theory has not failed of opposition. Delitzsch holds that "Sheshach" represents Šiš-kû-KI of an old Bab regal register, which may have stood for a part of the city of Babylon. (For a refutation of this interpretation see Schrader, *KAT*², 415; COT, II, 108 f.) Lauth, too, takes "Sheshach" to be a Hebraization of Šiška, a Bab district. Winckler and Sayce read Uru-azagga. Finally, Cheyne and a number of critics hold that the word has crept into the text, being "a conceit of later editors." See further Jeremiah, 6.

SHESHBAZZAR, shesh-baz′ar (שֵׁשְׁבַּצַּר, shesh-baççar, or 'שֵׁ, shēshbaççar): Sheshbazzar is the Heb or Aram. form of the Bab Shamash-aba-uṣur, or Shamash-bana-uṣur: "Oh Shamash, protect the father." It is possible that the full name was Shamash-ban-zeri-Babili-uṣur, "Oh Shamash, protect the father [builder] of the seed of Babylon." (See Zerubbabel, and compare the Bab names Ashur-bana-uṣur, Ban-ziri, Nabu-ban-ziri, Shamash-ban-apli, Shamash-apil-uṣur, Shamash-ban-aḫi, and others in Tallquist's Neubabylonisches Namenbuch, and the Aram. names on nos. 35, 44, 36, and 45 of Clay's Aramaic Dockets.) If this latter was the full name, there would be little doubt that Sheshbazzar may have been the same person as Zerubbabel, since the former is called in Ezr 5 14 the governor of Judah, and the latter is called by the same title in Hag 1 1.14; 2 2.21. It is more probable, however, that Sheshbazzar and Zerubbabel were different persons, and that Sheshbazzar was governor of Judah in the time of Cyrus and Zerubbabel in that of Darius. It is possible that Sheshbazzar came to Jerus in the time of Cyrus and laid the foundations, and that Zerubbabel came later in the time of Darius Hystaspis and completed the building of the temple (cf Ezr 2 68; 4 2; Hag 1 14).

According to Ezr 1 8 Sheshbazzar was the prince (Hannasi) of Judah into whose hands Cyrus put the vessels of the house of the Lord which Nebuchadnezzar had brought forth out of Jerus and had put in the house of his gods. It is further said in ver 11 that Sheshbazzar brought these vessels with them of the captivity which he brought up from Babylon to Jerus. In Ezr 5 14 f it is said that these vessels had been delivered by Cyrus unto one whose name was Sheshbazzar, whom he had made governor (peḥāh), and that Sheshbazzar came and laid the foundations of the house of God which was in Jerus. See Sanabassar.

SHESHAI, shē′shī (שֵׁשַׁי, shēshay): One of the sons of Anak, perhaps an old Hebronite clan name. (Sayce combines the name with Šasu, √ שסה, the Egyp name for the Syrian Bedouins.) The clan lived in Hebron at the time of the conquest and was expelled by Caleb (Nu 13 22, B, Σεσσεί, Sesseí, A, Σεμεί, Semeí; Josh 15 14, B, Σουσεί, Souseí, A, Σουσαί, Sousaí; Jgs 1 10, B, Σεσσεί, Sesseí, A, Γεθθί, Geththí).

SHESHAN, shē′shan (שֵׁשָׁן, shēshān; Σωσάν, Sōsán): A Jerahmeelite whose daughter married his servant Jarha (1 Ch 2 31.34.35). The genealogical list which follows embraces some very early names (cf Curtis, ICC, ad loc.).

SHETH. See Seth.

SHETHAR, shē′thär (שֵׁתַר, shēthar; B and Luc., Σαρσαθαῖος, Sarsathaíos, A, Σαρέσθεος, Saréstheos): One of the "seven princes" at the court of Ahasuerus (Est 1 14); these princes "sat first in the kingdom" and had the right of entrance to the king's presence at any time, except when he was in the company of one of his wives. (According to Marquart, Fund., 69, Shethar comes from שרשתי, with which the Pers šiyātis, "joy," is to be compared.) The word has never really been satisfactorily explained; it is presumably Pers.

SHETHAR-BOZENAI, shē′thär-boz′ḗ-nī, SHETHAR-BOZNAI, shē′thär-boz′nī, -boz′nå-ī, (שְׁתַר בּוֹזְנַי, shᵉthar bōznay, meaning uncertain): The name of a Pers (?) official mentioned with Tattenai in connection with the correspondence with Darius relative to the rebuilding of the Temple (Ezr 5 3.6; 6 6.12; B, Σαθαρβουζάν, Satharbouzán, A, Σαθαρβουζαναί, Satharbouzanaí, in 5 3; 6 13; Σαθαρβουζανής, Satharbouzanḗs, in 5 6; Σαθαρβουζανέ, Satharbouzané, in 6 6; Luc., throughout, Θαρβουζαναῖος, Tharbouzanaíos), called in 1 Esd 6 3.7.27; 7 1 "Shathrabuzanes."

Among the conjectures as to the meaning and derivation of the name, the following may be mentioned: (1) Shethar-boznai may be a corruption of מְתַרְבּוֹזְנַי, mᵉtharbōznay = Μιθροβουζάνης, Mithrobouzánēs, Old Pers Mithrobauzana—i.e. "Mithra is deliverer." (2) שְׁתַר is identical with the Old Pers Çithra ("seed," "brilliance"); names have been found that are confounded with this word. (3) שְׁתַר בּוֹזְנַי may be a title, but שֹׁתַר, sᵉthar, must then be read for שְׁתַר, shᵉthar. (4) שתר בזני is equivalent to the Old Pers Sêthrabûzana, "empire-delivering"; cf EB, art. "Shethar-boznai," and BDB.

SHEVA, shē′va (שְׁוָא, shᵉwā'; B, Σαού, Saoú, A, Σαούλ, Saoúl, Luc., Σουέ, Soué):

(1) A son of Caleb by his concubine Maacah (1 Ch 2 49).

(2) See Shavshah.

SHEW, SHOW, shō: "Show" (so always ARV) is simply a modernized spelling of "shew" (so always in AV and generally in ERV), and it should be carefully noted that "shew" is never pronounced "shoo," not even in the combination "shewbread"; cf "sew."

In AV "shew" as a vb. is the tr of a very large number of terms in the original. This number is reduced considerably by RV (esp. in the NT), but most of these changes are to secure uniformity of rendition, rather than to correct obscurities. The proper sense of the vb., of course, is "to cause a person to see" (Gen 12 1, etc) or "to cause a thing [or "person"] to be seen" (Dt 4 35; Jgs 4 22, etc). "Seeing," naturally, can be taken as intellectual or moral (Jer 38 21; Ps 16 11, etc), and can even be used for "hearing" (Isa 43 9, etc; contrast RV 1 S 9 27). Hence "shew" can be used as a general tr for the most various phrases, as "be shewed" for γίνομαι, gínomai, "come to pass" (Acts 4 22, RV "be wrought"); "shew forth themselves" for ἐνεργέω, energéō, "be active" (Mt 14 2, RV "work"); "shew" for ποιέω, poiéō, "do" (Acts 7 36, RV "having wrought"); for διηγέομαι, diēgéomai, "relate" (Lk 8 39, RV "declare"); for δηλόω, dēlóō, "make clear" (2 Pet 1 14, RV "signify"), etc. In Cant 2 9 AV (ERV) "shewing himself" and ARV (ERVm) "glanceth" both miss the poetry of the original: "His eyes shine in through the lattice" (çūç, "blossom," "sparkle").

AV's uses of the noun "shew" usually connote appearance in contrast to reality. So Lk 20 47, "for a shew" (πρόφασις, próphasis, "apparent cause," RV "pretence"); Col 2 23, "shew of wisdom" (so RV, λόγος, lógos, "word," "repute"); Gal 6 12, "make a fair shew" (so RV, εὐπροσωπέω, euprosōpéō, "have a fair face"); Ps 39 6, "vain shew" (so ARV צֶלֶם, çelem, "image," RVm "shadow"). However, in Sir 43 1 (ὅραμα, hórama, "spectacle" [so RV]) and in Col 2 15 (δειγματίζω, deigmatízō, "to display") "shew" = "spectacle."

In Isa 3 9 "the shew of their countenance" is a bad tr for "their respect of persons" (so RVm for hakkārath p^enēhem). The "shewing" of the Baptist "unto Israel" (Lk 1 80 AV, ERV) is of course his appearing to begin his ministry.

1. The Term

SHEWBREAD, shō'bred, THE (לֶחֶם הַפָּנִים, leḥem ha-pānīm, "bread of the presence"; ἡ πρόθεσις τῶν ἄρτων, hē próthesis tôn ártōn [He 9 2]; ARV "showbread." See Shew): The marginal reading of Ex 25 30; 35 13, RV "Presence-bread," exactly gives the meaning of the Heb. In 2 Ch 2 4 it is spoken of as the "continual showbread," because it was to be before Jeh "alway" (Ex 25 30).

2. Mosaic Regulations

Later Judaism has much to say as to the number and size of the loaves, more properly thin cakes, which bore this name, together with many minute regulations as to the placing of the loaves, the covering of them with frankincense, and other ritualistic vapidities. All that the Mosaic legislation required was that, once in every week, there should be twelve cakes of unleavened bread, each containing about four-fifths of a peck of fine flour, placed in two piles upon a pure table with frankincense beside each pile and changed every Sabbath day (Lev 24 5–9). From the description of the table upon which the flat cakes were to lie (Ex 25 23–30; 37 10–16), it held a series of golden vessels comprising dishes, spoons, flagons and bowls. As it is unlikely that empty cups were set before Jeh—they being described as "the vessels which were upon the table"—we may conclude that the table held presentation offerings of "grain and wine and oil," the three chief products of the land (Dt 7 13). The "dishes" were probably the salvers on which the thin cakes were piled, six on each. The "flagons" would contain wine, and the bowls (made with spouts, "to pour withal"), the oil; while the "spoons" held the frankincense, which was burned as a memorial, "even an offering made by fire unto Jeh." The cakes themselves were eaten by the priests on every Sabbath day, as being among the "most holy" sacrifices. Each of the synoptists refers to the incident of David and his companions having eaten of the shewbread (hoi ártoi tês prothéseōs), as told in 1 S 21 4–6 (Mt 12 4; Mk 2 26; Lk 6 4).

3. On Journeyings

At such times as the removal of the tabernacle took place, the separate appointments of the table of incense were not parted from it, but were carried with it—dishes, spoons, bowls, and cups (Nu 4 7). These, like the other furniture, were borne by the Kohathite Levites, but a few articles of lighter weight were in the personal care of the high priest. These comprised the oil for the candlestick, the sweet incense, the holy oil of consecration, and the meal for the continual bread offering (Nu 4 7.8.16). Small quantities of these alone would be borne from place to place, such as would be needed with the least delay to refurnish the vessels of the sanctuary on every reërection of the tent of meeting.

4. Significance

With this view of the nature, we have a natural and adequate sense of the meanings and importance of the shewbread, in the economy of the temple ritual and service. It was a continual reminder to the worshippers of the truth that man does not live by bread alone, emphasized by the fact that these most holy offerings were afterward eaten. It was the OT version of the prayer, "Give us this day our daily bread"; and in the fact that the holy table was never for a moment left without some loaves lying on it, we have the symbol of man's continued and unbroken dependence upon God. Even during the travels of the table of shewbread with the tabernacle, the "continual bread" was required to be in its place thereon (Nu 4 7).

It has been usual to say that "frankincense in golden urns stood beside the twelve loaves" (EB, IV, col. 4212). But this is a mere repetition of a Jewish legend, as spoons were the recognized holders of the frankincense to be burned (cf Nu 7 14 ff). Such spoons formed a part of the equipment of the shewbread table, and on the removal of the week-old cakes the spoons were carried forth and the frankincense in them burned on the great altar on the Sabbath day. If this were done while the grain and wine and oil were being consumed, it would derive additional significance, as betokening the gratitude and adoration of the representative recipients of the bounties of Nature, just as the daily burning of incense in the holy place betokened the worship and adoration of the praying multitudes without the temple (Lk 1 10). See Shewbread, Table of.

SHEWBREAD, TABLE OF (שֻׁלְחָן, shulḥān [Ex 25 25–30, etc]; ἡ τράπεζα καὶ ἡ πρόθεσις τῶν ἄρτων, hē trápeza kaí hē próthesis tôn ártōn [He 9 2]): For construction, see Tabernacle; Temple. A rude representation of the table is given on the Arch of Titus in Rome. The bas-relief was measured by Professor Boni in 1905, and the height and width of the represented tables were found to be 48 cms., or nearly 19 in. The table represented is, of course, that of Herod's temple, taken at the fall of Jerus in 70 AD. See the author's art. on "The Temple Spoils" in PEFS, 1906, 306 ff.

The table of shewbread is to be distinguished from the altar of incense. It has become the fashion of the newer criticism to deny the existence of the altar of incense in preëxilic times, and to explain the allusion to it in 1 K 6 20 as the table of shewbread (so in Ezk 41 22). The other references (1 K 6 22; 7 48; 9 25) are dismissed as interpolations. The procedure is radically vicious. The table of shewbread is not an "altar," though the altar is once spoken of as a "table" (Ezk 41 22). There was only one altar of incense (1 K 6 20), but (in 2 Ch 4 8) ten tables of shewbread. See Shewbread.

SHIBAH, shī'ba (שִׁבְעָה, shibh'āh, "seven"; ὅρκος, hórkos; Swete reads Φρέαρ ὅρκου, Phréar hórkou, lit. "well of oath"; AV Shebah): The name of the original well of Beer-sheba according to Gen 26 33. See Beer-sheba.

SHIBBOLETH, shib'ō-leth (שִׁבֹּלֶת, shibbōleth): A test of speech applied by the men of Gilead to the Ephraimites, who wished to cross the Jordan, after defeat. If they pronounced the word ṣibbōlēth, their dialectic variety of speech betrayed them (Jgs 12 6). The word probably has the sense of "stream" or "flood" (cf Ps 69 2).

SHIBMAH, shib'ma (שִׂבְמָה, sibhmāh). See Sibmah.

SHICRON, shik'ron (שִׁכְּרוֹן, shikk^erōn). See Shikkeron.

SHIELD, shēld. See Armor, IV, 1.

SHIGGAION, shi-gā'yon, shi-gī'on (שִׁגָּיוֹן, shiggāyōn): Occurs in the title of Ps 7, and, in the pl., in the verse introducing Habakkuk's prayer (Hab 3 1). Derived from a vb. meaning "to wander," it is generally taken to mean a dithyramb, or rhapsody.

This is not supported by the Gr VSS, but they are evidently quite at a loss. See Psalms, Book of.

SHIHON, shī′hon (שִׁיאֹן, shī′ōn). See Shion.

SHIHOR, shī′hôr (שִׁיחוֹר, shīḥōr, also written without י and ו in Heb and incorrectly "Sihor" in Eng.): A stream of water mentioned in connection with Egypt. Joshua (13 3) speaks of the "Shihor, which is before Egypt," a stream which commentators have thought to be "the brook of Egypt," the stream which separated Egypt from Pal, now called Wâdy el-'Arish. Jeremiah (2 18 AV) says, "What hast thou to do in the way to Egypt, to drink the waters of Sihor?" Commentators have thought Shihor in this case to be a name for the Nile. Both interpretations cannot be correct. Whatever the name S. means, at least it did not denote a movable river. It must be the same stream in both these passages, and no identification of the stream can be correct that does not satisfy both of them. Professor Naville has recently shown conclusively (Proc. Soc. Bib. Arch., January, 1913) that neither of these interpretations is strictly correct, and has made clear the Bib. references to S. In the northeasternmost province of ancient Egypt, Khentabt ("Fronting on the East"), was a canal, a fresh-water stream drawn off from the Nile, called in the Egyp language Shi-t-Hor, i.e. "the Horus Canal" (the -t- is an Egyp fem. ending). There have been many changes in the branches and canals from the Nile in the Delta, and this one with many others has been lost altogether; but there is a tradition among the Bedouin of Wâdy el-'Arish to this day that once a branch of the Nile came over to that point. This Shi-t-Hor, "Stream of Horus," makes perfectly clear and harmonious the different references of Scripture to S. It was "before Egypt," as Josh describes it, and it was the first sweet water of Egypt which the traveler from Pal in those days was able to obtain, as the words of Jeremiah indicate. "To drink the waters of S." meant to reach the supply of the fresh water of the Nile at the border of the desert. The two other references to S. (1 Ch 13 5; Isa 23 3) are perfectly satisfied by this identification. The "seed of S." (Isa 23 3 AV) would be grain from Egypt by way of the Shihor. M. G. Kyle

SHIHOR-LIBNATH, shī′hôr-lib′nath (שִׁיחוֹר לִבְנָת, shīḥōr libhnāth; B, τῷ Σειὼν καὶ Λαβανάθ, tō Seiōn kaí Labanáth, A, Σειώρ κτλ., Seiōr, etc): A place named on the boundary of Asher (Josh 19 26). It seems to mark with Carmel the western limit, and may have been on the S. of that mountain. Pesh, Syr, and Onom take this as two distinct names attaching to cities in this region. So far, however, no trace of either name has been found in the course of very careful exploration. More probably Shihor was the name of a river, "Libnath" distinguishing it from the Nile, which was called Shihor of Egypt. It may have been called Shihor because, like the Nile, it contained crocodiles. The boundary of Asher included Dor (Ṭanṭūrah), so the river may be sought S. of that town. Crocodiles are said still to be found in the Kishon; but this river runs N. of Carmel. The Crocodeilon of Ptolemy (V. xv.5; xvi.2) and Pliny (v.19), which the latter makes the southern boundary of Phoenicia, may possibly be Nahr ez-Zerḳā, which enters the sea about 5 miles S. of Ṭanṭūrah. Here also it is said the crocodile is sometimes seen. Perhaps therefore we may identify this stream with Shihor-libnath. W. Ewing

SHIKKERON, shik′ēr-on (שִׁכְּרוֹן, shikkᵉrōn; AV Shicron): A place mentioned in Josh 15 11 as being on the northern border of Judah, between Ekron and Baalah, Jabneel being beyond, toward the sea. The site is unknown, but Rev. C. Hauser (PEFS, 1907, 289) suggests Tell es-Sellakeh, N.W. of 'Akir, remarking that if this were the site the boundary would follow a natural course over the mountain to Jabneel.

SHILHI, shil′hī (שִׁלְחִי, shilḥī): Father of Jehoshaphat's mother (1 K 22 42=2 Ch 20 31; B A in 2 Ch, Σαλεί, Saleí, B in 1 K, Σεμεεί, Semeeí, A in 1 K, Σαλαλά, Salalá, Luc. in both, Σελεεί, Seleeí). Cheyne (EB, art. "Shilhi") ventures the supposition that "Shilhi" is a misreading for "Shilhim" (Josh 15 32), and is therefore the name of a place rather than that of a person; he holds it to be the name of the birthplace of Azubah, the king's mother.

SHILHIM, shil′him (שִׁלְחִים, shilḥīm [Josh 15 32]): See Shaaraim, (2). Possibly Azubah the mother of Jehoshaphat, who is called "the daughter of Shilhi" (1 K 22 42; 2 Ch 20 31), was a native of Shilhim.

SHILLEM, shil′em, SHILLEMITES, shil′em-īts (שִׁלֵּם, shillēm, הַשִּׁלֵּמִי, ha-shillēmī): Shillem is found in Gen 46 24, a son of Naphtali; Shillemites, his descendants, are mentioned in Nu 26 49; Shallum (q.v.) is found in 1 Ch 7 13.

SHILOAH, shi-lō′a, shī-lō′a (Isa 8 6). See Siloam.

SHILOH, shī′lō (שִׁילֹה, shīlōh): The prophecy in Gen 49 10, "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, ... until Shiloh come," etc, has been the subject of very diverse interpretations. RVm gives as alternative renderings, " 'Till he come to Shiloh having the obedience of the peoples' Or, acc. to Syr, 'Till he come whose it is,' etc." (1) From the earliest times the passage has been regarded as Messianic, but the rendering in the text, which takes "Shiloh" as a proper name, bearing a meaning such as "peaceful" (cf Isa 9 6, "Prince of Peace"), labors under the difficulty that Shiloh is not found elsewhere as a personal name in the OT, nor is it easy to extract from it the meaning desired. Further, the word was not personally applied to the Messiah in any of the ancient VSS, which rather assume a different reading (see below). Apart from a purely fanciful passage in the Talm (cf Driver, Gen, 413), this application does not appear earlier than the version of Seb. Münster in the 16th cent. (1534). (2) The rendering, "till he come to Shiloh," where Shiloh is taken as the name of a place, not a person, is plausible, but is felt to yield no suitable sense in the context. It is, therefore, now also set aside by most recent scholars. (3) The 3d rendering, which regards Shiloh as representing the Heb שֶׁלֹּה (shellōh)=שֶׁלֹּה for אֲשֶׁר לוֹ, 'ăsher lō, "whose [it is]," has in its favor the fact that this is evidently the reading presupposed in the LXX, the Pesh, and the Jewish Tgs, and seems to be alluded to in Ezk 21 27, "until he come whose right it is." In this view the passage has still a Messianic reference, though critics argue that it must then be regarded as late in origin. Other interpretations need not detain us. See for details the full discussions in Hengstenberg's Christology, I, 54 ff, ET, the comms. of Delitzsch, Driver, and Skinner, on Gen (esp. Excursus II in Driver), and the arts. in the various Bible dicts.; see also Prophecy.

SHILOH (the most usual form is שִׁלֹה, shīlōh, but it appears 8 t as שִׁלוֹ, shīlō, and 3 t as שִׁילוֹ; Σηλώ, Sēlô, Σηλώμ, Sēlôm): A town in the lot of Ephraim where Israel assembled under Joshua at the close of the war of conquest (Josh 18 1). Here territory was allotted to the seven tribes who had not yet received their portions. A commission was sent out to "describe the land into seven portions"; this having been done, the inheritances were assigned by lot. Here also were assigned to the Levites their cities in the territories of the various tribes (chs 18–21). From Shiloh Reuben and Gad departed for their homes E. of the Jordan; and here the tribes gathered for war against these two, having misunderstood their building of the great altar in the Jordan valley (ch 22). From Jgs 18 31 we learn that in the period of the Judges the house of God was in Shiloh; but when the sanctuary was moved thither from Gilgal there is no indication. The maids of Shiloh were captured by the Benjamites on the occasion of a feast, while dancing in the vineyards; this having been planned by the other tribes to provide the Benjamites with wives without involving themselves in responsibility (21 21 ff). While the house of the Lord remained here it was a place of pilgrimage (1 S 1 3). To Shiloh Samuel was brought and consecrated to God's service (ver 24). The sanctuary was presided over by Eli and his wicked sons; and through Samuel the doom of their house was announced. The capture of the ark by the Philis, the fall of Hophni and Phinehas, and the death of the aged priest and his daughter-in-law followed with startling rapidity (chs 3,4). The sanctuary in Shiloh is called a "temple" (1 9; 3 3) with doorpost and doors (1 9; 3 15). It was therefore a more durable structure than the old tent. See TABERNACLE; TEMPLE. It would appear to have been destroyed, probably by the Philis; and we find the priests of Eli's house at Nob, where they were massacred at Saul's order (22 11 ff). The disaster that befell Shiloh, while we have no record of its actual occurrence, made a deep impression on the popular mind, so that the prophets could use it as an effective illustration (Ps 78 60; Jer 7 12.14; 26 6). Here the blind old prophet Ahijah was appealed to in vain by Jeroboam's wife on behalf of her son (1 K 14 2.4), and it was still occupied in Jeremiah's time (41 5).

The position of Shiloh is indicated in Jgs 21 19, as "on the north of Beth-el, on the east side of the highway that goeth up from Beth-el to Shechem, and on the south of Lebonah." This is very explicit, and points definitely to Seilūn, a ruined site on a hill at the N.E. of a little plain, about 9 miles N. of Beitīn (Bethel), and 3 miles S.E. of Khān el-Lubbān (Lebonah), to the E. of the highway to Shechem (Nāblus). The path to Seilūn leaves the main road at Sinjil, going eastward to Turmus ‛Aya, then northward across the plain. A deep valley runs to the N. of the site, cutting it off from the adjoining hills, in the sides of which are rock-hewn tombs. A good spring rises higher up the valley. There are now no vineyards in the district; but indications of their ancient culture are found in the terraced slopes around.

Excavations here were conducted in '22 by a Danish expedition under the direction of Dr. O. A. Schmidt. No Canaanite strata were found; the earliest is early Israelite. Shiloh does not appear to have been occupied at all until the tabernacle was pitched there soon after the conquest of Palestine by the Israelites. The results of these excavations agree remarkably well with the Biblical indications (Bull. American School of Oriental Research, Feb '23). Further excavations are in progress at this site in 1929. SHILONITE, shī'lō-nīt (שִׁילֹנִי, shīlōni [2 Ch 9 29], שִׁילוֹנִי, shīlōnī [10 15; Neh 11 5], שִׁלֹנִי; Σηλωνεί, Sēlōneí, Σηλωνείτης, Sēlōneítēs): This denotes an inhabitant of Shiloh, and applies (1) to Ahijah the prophet (1 K 11 29, etc); and (2) to a family of the children of Judah, who, after the exile, made their home in Jerus (1 Ch 9 5; Neh 11 5, AV "Shiloni").

SHILSHAH, shil'shä (שִׁלְשָׁה, shilshāh; B A, Σαλεισά, Saleisá, Luc., Σελεμσάν, Selemsán): An Asherite (1 Ch 7 37).

SHIMEA, shim'ē-a (שִׁמְעָא, shim‛ā'): See SHAMMUA and SHAMMAH.

(1) Brother of David (see SHAMMAH).

(2) Son of David (1 Ch 3 5, B, Σάμαν, Sáman; but in 2 S 5 14; 1 Ch 14 4, "Shammua").

(3) A Merarite Levite (1 Ch 6 30, B, Σομέα, Soméa, A, Σαμά, Samá, Luc., Σαμαά, Samaá).

(4) A Gershonite Levite (1 Ch 6 39 [24], Σεμαά, Semaá).

SHIMEAH, shim'ē-a (שִׁמְאָה, shim'āh; B, Σεμαά, Semaá, A, Σαμεά, Sameá, Luc., Σαμαά, Samaá): A descendant of Jehiel, the "father" of Gibeon (1 Ch 8 32); in 1 Ch 9 38 he is called "Shimeam" (B א, Luc., Σαμαά, Samaá, A, Σαμά, Samá; see JQR, XI, 110–13, §§10–12).

SHIMEAM, shim'ē-am. See SHIMEAH.

SHIMEATH, shim'ē-ath (שִׁמְעָת, shim‛āth, or שִׁמְעַת, shim‛ath; LXX in 2 K, 'Ιεμουάθ, Iemouáth, B in 2 Ch, Σαμά, Samá, A, Σαμάθ, Samáth, Luc., Σαμαάθ, Samaáth): Father of Jozacar (2 K 12 21 [22]), one of the murderers of Joash, king of Judah. According to 2 Ch 24 26 Shimeath is an Ammonitess and the mother, not the father, of Jozacar. Many textual emendations have been suggested (cf HDB, art. "Shimeath"), but they are unnecessary, as the Chronicler's revised version of the incident in K was a deliberate one. The Chronicler was a sturdy opponent of intermarriage, and in the story of the assassination of King Joash he saw an opportunity to strike a blow against the hated practice. In the older account in K the names of the conspirators are given as "Jozakar the son of שִׁמְעָת [shim‛āth], and Jehozabad the son of שֶׁמֶר [shemer]." The two names are both masc.; but the final ת of the former looked to the Chronicler like the fem. ending and offered him his opportunity. In his account, the one of the two murderers (dastardly villains, even though the king had merited death) was "the son of שִׁמְעַת [shim‛ath], the Ammonitess," and the other was "the son of שִׁמְרִית [shimrīth], the Moabitess" (cf Torrey, Ezra Studies, 212 ff).

SHIMEATHITES, shim'ē-ath-īts (שִׁמְעָתִים, shim‛āthīm; B A, Σαμαθιείμ, Samathieím, Luc., Σαμαθείν, Samatheín): A subdivision of the tribe of Caleb (1 Ch 2 55). In the three families mentioned in this passage Jerome saw three distinct classes of religious functionaries: Vulg canentes atque resonantes et in tabernaculis commorantes. The Tg has a similar explanation, except that the "Sucathites" are those "covered" with a spirit of prophecy. Bertheau (Handbuch zum AT) accepts Jerome's explanation, except that he regards the first class as gate-keepers (Aram. תְּרַע, t^{e}ra‛ = Heb שַׁעַר, sha‛ar). Wellhausen (DGJ, 30 f) finds underlying the three names תִּרְעָה, tir‛āh, a technical term for sacred music-making, שִׁמְעָה, shim‛āh, the Halacha or sacred tradition. Buhl (HWB^{13}) derives Shimeathites and Sucathites from unknown places. Keil interprets as descendants from the unknown Shemei (cf Curtis, ICC). The passage is hopelessly obscure. HORACE J. WOLF

SHIMEI, shim′ē-ī (שִׁמְעִי, shim‘ī, possibly "hear me [El]" or "[Jah]"; Σεμεεί, Semeeí, Σεμεί, Semeí): A name of frequent occurrence throughout the OT records, sometimes varying slightly in form in EV. AV has "Shimi" in Ex 6 17; "Shimhi" in 1 Ch 8 21; "Shimeah" in 2 S 21 21. RV has "Shimeites" in Zec 12 13, where AV has "Shimei," and Nu 3 21 for AV "Shimites." EV has "Shema" in 1 Ch 8 13.21 m for the "Shimei" of ver 21. In all others of the many occurrences in AV and RV the form is "Shimei."

(1) A family name among the Levites before and after the exile, at least five of whom bore it: (a) Son of Gershon and grandson of Levi (Ex 6 17; Nu 3 18; 1 Ch 6 17; 23 7.10). The text of 1 Ch 6 and 23 is corrupt, making difficult the tracing of the various genealogies and the identification of the several Shimeis. Evidently that of 23 9 is a scribe's error for one of the four sons of Ladan or Libni, whose names are given in the preceding verse. (b) An ancestor of Asaph the musician (1 Ch 6 42), possibly the same as (a) above, Jahath the son of S. (cf 23 10) being by a copyist's error transposed so as to read as if he were the father of S. (c) A descendant of the Merarite branch of the Levites (1 Ch 6 29). (d) One of the 288 trained singers in the service of the sanctuary under Asaph (1 Ch 25 17). (e) One of the Levites who helped to cleanse the Temple in Hezekiah's reformation (2 Ch 29 14). He was a descendant of Heman the musician. Hezekiah afterward appointed him with Conaniah to have chief oversight of "the oblations and the tithes and the dedicated things" which were brought into the chambers of Jeh's house prepared for them (2 Ch 31 11.12). (f) A Levite who under Ezra put away his foreign wife (Ezr 10 23), "Semeis" in 1 Esd 9 23.

(2) The best-known Bible character of this name is the Benjamite, of the family of Saul (2 S 16 5–12; 19 16–20; 1 K 2 8.9.36–46), who met David at Bahurim as he was fleeing from Absalom, and in bitter and cowardly fashion cursed and attacked the hard-pressed king. Apparently David's flight to the Jordan led through a narrow ravine, on one side of which, or on the ridge above, stood Shimei in safety as he cast stones at David and his men, cursing as he threw (2 S 16 5.6). His hatred of David who had displaced his royal kinsman Saul had smouldered long in his mean heart; and now the flame bursts out, as the aged and apparently helpless king flees before his own son. S. seizes the long-coveted opportunity to pour out the acid hate of his heart. But when David's faithful companions would cross the ravine to make quick work of S., the noble king forbade them with these remarkable words: "Behold, my son, who came forth from my bowels, seeketh my life: how much more may this Benjamite now do it? let him alone, and let him curse; for Jeh hath bidden him. It may be that Jeh . . . . will requite me good for his cursing" (2 S 16 11.12). After Absalom's overthrow, as the king was returning victorious and vindicated, S. met him at the Jordan with most abject confession and with vows of allegiance (2 S 19 16–23).

The king spared his life; but shortly before his death charged his son Solomon to see that due punishment should come to Shimei for his sins: "Thou shalt bring his hoar head down to Sheol with blood" (1 K 2 9). When he came to the throne Solomon summoned Shimei and bade him build a house in Jerus, to which he should come and from which he must not go out on pain of death (1 K 2 36–38). Feeling secure after some years, Shimei left his home in Jerus to recapture some escaped slaves (vs 39–41), and in consequence he was promptly dispatched by that gruesome avenger of blood, the royal executioner, "Benaiah the son of Jehoiada," who "fell upon him," as he had upon Adonijah and Joab, "so that he died" (ver 46).

(3) Another Benjamite, mentioned with Rei as an officer in the king's bodyguard, who was faithful to David in the rebellion of Adonijah (1 K 1 8). Jos reads Rei as a common noun, describing S. as "the friend of David." He is to be identified with the son of Elah (1 K 4 18), whom Solomon, probably because of his fidelity, named as one of the 12 chief commissary officers appointed over all Israel, "who provided victuals for the king and his household."

(4) A man of some prominence in the tribe of Benjamin (1 Ch 8 21), whose home was in Aijalon, where he was a "head of fathers' houses" (ver 13); but his descendants lived in Jerus (ver 28). In AV he is called "Shimhi"; in ver 13 he is called "Shema."

(5) Another Benjamite, an ancestor of Mordecai (Est 2 5), "Semeias" in Ad Est 11 2.

(6) A brother of David (2 S 21 21, AV "Shimeah"); in 1 S 16 9 he is called "Shammah"; cf "Shimeah," "Shimea."

(7) A man of Judah, called "the Ramathite," who was "over the vineyards" in David's reign (1 Ch 27 27).

(8) A Simeonite living in the time of David (1 Ch 4 26.27), whose chief claim to distinction was that he was father of 16 sons and 6 daughters. The descendants of such a numerous progeny, not being able to maintain themselves in their ancestral home in Beer-sheba, in the days of Hezekiah fell upon Gerar, and dispossessed "the sons of Ham" (ver 39 LXX), and upon Mt. Seir, driving out the Amalekites (ver 43).

(9) A man of Reuben, son of Gog (1 Ch 5 4).

(10), (11) Two men of "Israel," i.e. not priests or Levites, one "of the sons of Hashum" (Ezr 10 33), the other "of the sons of Bani" (10 38), who put away their foreign wives at Ezra's command, in 1 Esd called respectively "Semei" (9 33) and "Someis" (9 34).

(12) A brother of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3 19).

The Shimeites were descendants of Shimei, grandson of Levi; cf (1) (a) above (Nu 3 21; Zec 12 13). EDWARD MACK

SHIMEON, shim′ē-on (שִׁמְעוֹן, shim‘ōn; elsewhere "Simeon"): One of the sons of Harim who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 31; BA, Σεμεών, Semeṓn, Luc., Συμεών, Sumeṓn = 1 Esd 9 32, "Simon Chosameus").

SHIMHI, shim′hī. See SHIMEI.

SHIMI, shim′ī, shī′mī, SHIMITES, shim′īts. See SHIMEI.

SHIMMA, shim′a. See SHAMMAH.

SHIMON, shī′mon (שִׁימוֹן, shīmōn; B, Σεμιών, Semiṓn, A, Σεμειών, Semeiṓn, Luc., Σαμί, Samí): A name in the Judahite genealogy (1 Ch 4 20).

SHIMRATH, shim′rath (שִׁמְרָת, shimrāth; Σαμαράθ, Samaráth): The last of nine sons of Shimei of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Ch 8 21).

SHIMRI, shim′rī (שִׁמְרִי, shimrī; various forms in LXX): There are four Hebrews mentioned in the Bible who bear this name:

(1) A Simeonite, a son of Shemaiah and father of Jedaiah, a chief of his tribe (1 Ch 4 37).

(2) The father of Jediael, a bodyguard of King David (1 Ch 11 45).

(3) A son of Hosah, a Levite. He was appointed by David to be doorkeeper in the house of the Lord. He was made chief of the tribe, although not the firstborn of his family (1 Ch 26 10).

(4) One of the sons of Elizaphan, a Levite. He assisted in purifying the temple in the time of Hezekiah (2 Ch 29 13). S. L. UMBACH

SHIMRITH, shim′rith (שִׁמְרִית, shimrīth, "guard," fem.): A Moabitess, the mother of Jehozabad, one of those that conspired against King Joash (2 Ch 24 26). Elsewhere (2 K 12 21) Jehozabad is described as the son of SHOMER (q.v.), the same name without the fem. ending.

SHIMRON, shim′ron (שִׁמְרוֹן, shimrōn, "watch"): The 4th son of Issachar (Gen 46 13; Nu 26 24; 1 Ch 7 1), and ancestor of the Shimronites (Nu 26 24).

SHIMRON (שִׁמְרוֹן, shimrōn; B, Συμοών, Sumoṑn, A, Σομερών, Somerṑn and other forms): A town whose king was tributary to Jabin king of Hazor, and who joined in the attempt to resist the invasion under Joshua (Josh 11 1). It was in the territory allotted to Zebulun (19 15). No sure identification is yet possible. LXX and Talm both omit the r from the name; and Neubauer would identify it with Simonias (Vita, 24), the Simonia of the Talm, which is now represented by Semūniyeh, a village about 5 miles W. of Nazareth, on the edge of the plain (Géog. du Talm). Beit Laḥm, named by Jos along with it, is a short distance to the N.W. Es-Semeirīyeh, about 3 miles N. of Acre, has also been suggested; but it is perhaps too far to the W. W. EWING

SHIMRON-MERON, shim′ron-mē′ron (שִׁמְרוֹן מְראוֹן, shimrōn mᵉr'ōn; Συμοών . . . . Μαμρώθ, Sumoṑn . . . . Mamrṑth, A, Σαμρών . . . . Φασγά . . . . Μαρών, Samrṑn . . . . Phasgá . . . . Marṑn): A royal city of the Canaanites, the king of which was slain by Joshua (12 20). Here the name is followed by that of Achshaph, which also follows the name of Shimron in 11 1. This suggests that the two are in reality one, and that Shimron-meron may only be the full name. A royal Can. city, Samsimuruna, is mentioned in the inscriptions of Sennacherib, Esar-haddon and Assur-bani-pal, which Schrader (*KAT*², 163) would identify with this, and thinks it may now be represented by es-Semeirīyeh. See SHIMRON. W. EWING

SHIMSHAI, shim′shī, shim′shā-ī (שִׁמְשַׁי, shimshay; B, Σαμασά, Samasá, Σαμαέ, Samaé, Σαμεαίς, Sameaís, Σαμεσά, Samesá, A, Σαμσαί, Samsaí, Luc., Σαμαίας, Samaías, throughout; in 1 Esd 2 17 he is called "Semellius," RV "Samellius"; a number of explanations of this name have been offered, but no one has been generally favored. One conjecture traces it to an Old Iranian caritative ששמי conformed to שמש; another prefers the Old Bactrian simēzhi=simaēzhi; cf BDB, s.v. The name looks as though it were derived from שֶׁמֶשׁ, shemesh, "the sun"): A state secretary who, with REHUM (q.v.) and others, wrote to Artaxerxes to persuade him to prohibit the rebuilding of the temple (Ezr 4 8.9.17.23). HORACE J. WOLF

SHIN, shēn, SIN, sēn (שׁ, שׂ): The 21st letter of the Heb alphabet; transliterated in this Encyclopaedia as sh, s. It came also to be used for the number 300. For name, etc, see ALPHABET.

SHINAB, shī′nab (שִׁנְאָב, shin'ābh, Sam. שִׁנְאָר, shin'ār; Σενναάρ, Sennaár): King of ADMAH (q.v.). He is mentioned with Shemeber, king of Zeboiim; he was attacked by Chedorlaomer and his allies (Gen 14 2). The reading is very uncertain. If the incident narrated is founded on fact, Shinab may be identical with Sanibu, an Ammonite king in the time of Tiglath-pileser III (so Fr. Delitzsch, Wo lag das Paradies? 294); or the name may be equated by the Assyr Sin-šar-uṣur (cf "Shenazzar"), and Shemeber with the Assyr Sumu-abi (Sayce, Expos T, VIII, 463). Jewish exegesis gives a sinister explanation of all four names (ver 2). The Midr (Bᵉr. Rab. 42) explains Shinab as שׁוֹאֵב מָמוֹן, shō'ēbh māmmōn, "one who draws money [wherever he can]." It is of interest to note that the names fall into two alliterative pairs and that each king's name contains exactly as many letters as that of his city. On the whole, however, the list leaves an impression of artificiality; as the names are not repeated in ver 8, it is highly probable that they are later additions to the text. HORACE J. WOLF

13. The System Employed, with an Example

1. Identification

The name given, in the earliest Heb records, to Babylonia, later called Babel, or the land of Babel (bābhel, 'ereç bābhel). In Gen 10 10 it is the district wherein lay Babel, Erech, Accad, and Calneh, cities which were the "beginning" of Nimrod's kingdom. In 11 2 Shinar is described as the land of the plain where migrants from the E. settled, and founded Babel, the city, and its great tower.

2. Possible Babylonian Form

Though sometimes identified with the Bab Šumer, the connection of Shinar with that name is doubtful. The principal difficulty lies in the fact that what might be regarded as the non-dialectical form šingar (which would alone furnish a satisfactory basis of comparison) is not found, and would, if existent, only apply to the southern portion of Babylonia. The northern tract was called Akkad, after the name of its capital city (see ACCAD). The Gr form Sen(n)aar shows that, at the time the LXX tr was made, there was no tradition that the 'ayin was guttural, as the supposed Bab forms would lead us to expect. As the Bib. form Shinar indicates the whole of Babylonia, it corresponds with the native (Sumerian) Kingi-Ura, rendered "Šumer and Akkad," from which, by changing K into Sh (found in Sumerian), Shinar may have been derived, but this explanation is not free from difficulties.

3. Sumerian and Other Equivalents

This twofold designation, Kingi-Ura, is that which is commonly used in the inscriptions of the earlier kings, though it cannot then have indicated always the whole country, but only such parts of it as acknowledged their overlordship. Later on the corresponding term seems to have been Kar-Duniaš ("the territory of the god Duniaš," to all appearance a term introduced by the Kassite rulers). Nabonassar and his successors seem to have contented themselves with the title "king of Babylon," rule in the city implying also the dominion over the whole country. Often, however, the equivalent term for Babylonia is E^{hi}, probably an abbreviation of Êridu, and here standing for the land belonging to that sacred city—"the good city," a type of Paradise, Babylonia being, in fact, situated upon the êdinu, or "plain" (see Eden).

4. The Syriac Sen’ar

All these comparisons tend to show that the Bab equivalent of Shinar is not any of the above, and as yet has not, in fact, been found. This is also implied by the fact, that Sen’ar was used in Syr for the country around Bagdad, and anciently included (it may be supposed) the plain upon which the ruins of Babylon stand. Sen’ar was therefore in all probability an ancient Bab designation of the tract, now lost, but regarded by the Hebrews as synonymous with Babylonia.

5. Primitive Tongue of Shinar

From the inscriptions it would seem that the primitive language of Shinar was not Semitic, but the agglutinative idiom now named Sumerian—a tongue long regarded as Turanian, and having, it is thought, Turko-Chinese affinities—gal, "to be," Turkish ol-mak; ama (ana), "mother," Turkish ana; abba, "old man," Turkish baba, "father"; (h)ê, "house," Turkish ev, etc. The Chinese affinities seem less close, but the following may be quoted: a(y)a, "father," Chinese ye (Amoy iâ); ge, "night," Chinese ye; gu, "to speak," Chinese yü; shu, "hand," Chinese sheù; kin, "business," Chinese kūng, "work"; etc. Chinese and Turkish, however, have had time to pass through many changes since Sumerian was current in Shinar. Many words of the Sumerian language were borrowed by the Sem Babylonians, and a few (like hēkal, "temple," Sem [h]êgal, "great house") entered the other Sem languages.

6. Comparison with Semitic Idiom

Halévy's contention, that Sumerian is simply "an allography" for the expression of Sem Bab, seems to be untenable, as they differ not only in words, but also in grammar; moreover, Sumerian had a dialect, called by the natives "woman's tongue." For the rest, the principal differences between Sumerian and Sem Bab are: (1) post-positional suffixes instead of prepositions; (2) verbs with long strings of prefixes and infixes to express the persons and regimens, instead of a prefix and a suffix; (3) compound words, both nouns and verbs, are common instead of being exceedingly rare. Sumerian seems to have borrowed several words from Sem Bab.

7. Testimony of the Sculptures, etc

Not only the language, but also the sculptures which they have left, point to the probability that the earlier inhabitants of Shinar belonged to a different race from the later. The Semites of Babylonia were to all appearance thick-set and muscular, but the Sumerians, notwithstanding the stumpy figures which their statues and bas-reliefs show, seem to have been slim—in any case, their warriors, in the better bas-reliefs, as well as the figures of the god Nin-Girsu (formerly known as "the god with the firestick"), and the engraved cylinders, have this type. Moreover, the sculptures and cylinder-seals show that certain classes—priests or the like—were clean shaven, in marked contrast to Sem usage elsewhere. Their deities, however, always had hair and beard, implying that they came from a different, though possibly related, stock. These deities were very numerous, and it is noteworthy that, though those with Sumerian names may be counted by hundreds, those with Sem names are only to be reckoned by tens.

8. Sumerians Probably Preceded Semites in Shinar

Though there is no certain indication which race entered Shinar first, it is to be noted that Nimrod, presumably Shinar's first king and the founder of its great cities, was a son of Cush (Gen 10 8), and the name of Shinar seems to have existed before the foundation of Babel (Babylon) and its tower (Gen 11 2). In the native sculptures, moreover, the non-Sem type precedes the Sem; and in the inscriptions the non-Sem idiom precedes that of the Sem tr. Everything points, therefore, to the Sumerians having been in Babylonia before the Sem inhabitants.

9. States of Shinar

At the earliest period to which our records refer the Sumerians of Shinar were divided into a number of small states, of which the following may be regarded as the principal:

(1) Sippar or Sippar-Aruru (-Ya’ruru), possibly including Accad (Gen 10 10), some distance S.W. of Bagdad. It is the modern ‘Abu-habbah, "father of grain." Though it seems to have fallen early under the dominion of the Semites, it was at first Sumerian, as its native name, Zimbir, and the ideographic writing thereof show. According to Berosus, who calls it Pantabiblion, one of its earliest kings was Amelon or Amillarus, who reigned 13 sari, or 46,800 years. Later on came Evedoreschus, the native Enwe-dur-an-ki, renowned as a priest favored by the gods. His descendants, if of pure race, inherited the divine grace which he enjoyed. It is said to have been in Sippara (Sippar) that Ut-napištim, the Bab Noah, buried the records before entering the ark.

(2) About 18 miles N. of Babylon lay Kêš, now Oheimer—a foundation which seems to have preceded Babylon as the capital of Shinar. Its early queen, Azag-Bau, is said to have been the wife of a wine-merchant and to have reigned 100 years.

(3) Babylon, for which see Babel; Babylon. As one of its early kings, Berosus mentions Alorus, "the shepherd of the people," as having reigned for 10 sari, or 36,000 years. The state of Babylon probably included Cuthah (Tel Ibrahim), which once had kings of its own, and possessed a special legend of the Creation. Belonging to Babylon, also, was the renowned city Borsippa, now Birs, or the Birs Nimroud, the traditional site of the Tower of Babel (see Babel, Tower of).

(4) Some distance S.E. of Babylon lay Nippur or Niffur, now Niffer (Noufar), identified by the rabbis with the "Calneh" of Gen 10 10. It was a place of considerable importance, and the seat of the worship of Enlil and Ninlil, later, also, of their son Ninip and his spouse (see Calneh). The American excavations on this site have thrown a flood of light upon almost every branch of Assyriological research.

(5) Adab, now called Bismaya, the city of Maḫ, the goddess of reproduction. One of the earliest rulers of Adab was seemingly called Lugal-dalu, of whom a fine statue, discovered by the American explorers, exists. It was apparently renowned as a necropolis.

(6) S. and a little W. of Adab was Šurippak, now Fara. This was the birthplace of the Bab Noah, Ut-napištim, son of Opartes (Umbara-Tutu), a Chaldaean of Larancha. The coming of the Flood was revealed to Ut-napištim here.

(7) Practically E. of Fara lay Umma or Gišuḫ (or Giuḫ), now Jokha. This city was apparently of considerable importance, and the traditional rival of Lagaš.

(8) S. of Fara lay Unuga, Sem Uruk, the Bib. Erech (q.v.), now Warka. Its most celebrated king, after Gilgameš, was Lugal-zaggi-si, one of the opponents of the rulers of Lagaš.

(9) Some distance E. of Warka was the territory of Lagaš, now Tel-loh—a little state, rather inaccessible, but of considerable importance to the antiquarian, which is a testimonial to the advance in civilization which it had made. Its kings and viceroys were among the most renowned, though apparently unknown outside their own domains. The most celebrated were the reformer Uru-kagina and viceroy Gudêa, to whom many erections in the city were due. (See Gudêa's remarkable statue in the Louvre.)

(10) Somewhat to the S.E. of Warka lay Larsa, the "Ellasar" of Gen 14 1 (q.v.). This center of learning maintained its independence even after the other states had been absorbed by Ḫammurabi and his dynasty into the Bab empire.

(11) To the S.E. of Warka and Senqara lies the site of the ancient Ur of the Chaldees (q.v.) now Mugheir. It was renowned for its temple to the moon, and for the kings known as the dynasty of Ur: Sur-Engur, Dungi, Bûr-Sin, Gimil-Sin, and Ibi-Sin.

(12) S. of the Ur lay Êridu, or, in full, Guru-duga, "the good city," wherein, apparently, lay the earthly Paradise. This is identified with the present 'Abu-shahrein, and was the seat of Ea or Enki, god of the sea and of fertilizing streams. According to the tradition, it was there that the "dark vine" grew—a type, seemingly, of the tree of life. The later kings of Babylon sometimes bear the title "king of Êridu," as though rulers of the domain of Paradise.

(13) The Land of the Sea (that bordering on the Pers Gulf), in which, seemingly, the Chaldaeans afterward settled, seems to have played an important part in the early history of Shinar. Berosus speaks of its king Ammenon, who reigned 12 sari, or 43,200 years, and in whose time the Musarus Oannes, or Annedotus, arose out of the Pers Gulf. Like others referred to in the legends which Berosus refers to, he was half-man and half-fish. It is thought that these incidents, though evidently mythical, point to the introduction of civilization into Babylonia, from this point. See also Jonah; Jonah, The Book of.

(14) Nisin, Isin, or Karrak, seat of the worship of Nin-Karraga, was also an important state governed by its own kings.

(15) Upê or Upia, the Gr Opis, apparently obtained renown at a very early date, its kings being given in the great chronological list before those of Kiš.

(16) Other well-known cities, possibly state-capitals, were Larak, Gr Laranche; Amarda, one of the centers of the worship of Nergal; Ašnunna, a province E. of the present Bagdad; Dilmu, now Dailem; Nuru, Ennigi, and Kakra, seemingly centers of the worship of Hadad; Tilmun, at the head of the Pers Gulf, and including the island of Bahrein; the province of Sabu; Šešeb or Bagdadu, possibly the modern Bagdad; and several others.

10. Shinar and Its Climate

Whether the country was in the same seemingly uncared-for state anciently as at present is unknown; but one cannot help admiring the courage of the original immigrants into such a district, for example, as that of Lagaš. This, which belongs to the southern region, is very inaccessible on account of the watercourses and marshes. Like the whole of Shinar in general, it is more or less dried up in summer, and unhealthy for Europeans. The alterations in the waterways, owing to changes in the irrigation-channels, must then, as now, have hindered communication. Sharp cold, with frost, succeeds the heat of summer, and from time to time sand-storms sweep across the plain. Notwithstanding the destruction sometimes wrought, the floods were always welcomed in consequence of the fruitfulness which followed, and which was such as to make Babylonia one of the most fertile tracts known.

11. Sculpture in Shinar

The reference to the Sumerian sculptures in (7) above will have shown that the inhabitants of the Plain of Shinar possessed an art of no mean order and of some antiquity, even at the time when it first presents itself to our notice. It is true that many specimens are crude and uncouth, but this is probably due to the sculptors having been, often enough, the slaves of their material. Their stones were frequently more or less pebble-shaped, and they had neither the skill nor the tools to reduce them to better proportions—moreover, reduction of bulk would have meant a diminution of their importance. The broad, squat figures which they produced, however, gave them bad models for their bas-reliefs, and it was long ere this defect was removed, notwithstanding the superior work produced by their seal-engravers during and after the 4th millennium BC.

12. First to Use Writing in Western Asia

But in all probability special renown will always be attached to the non-Semitic inhabitants of Shinar as the inventors, or at least the earliest users known to us, of the cuneiform script. It may be objected that the system which they introduced was cumbersome and imperfect, but they knew of nothing simpler, and modern Chinese, with which their script has been compared, is far less practical. Briefly, the system may be described as syllabic for the prefixes and suffixes, and ideographic for the roots. To show this the following transcribed example will probably suffice:

13. System Employed

Ê nu-DU URU nu-DIM, A house was not built, a city was not constructed;

URU nu-DIM ADAM nu-mun-GAR, A city was not constructed, a community he had not founded;

ABZU nu-DU GURUDUGA nu-DIM, The abyss was not built, Êridu was not constructed;

Ê AZAGA DINGIRene KI-DURA-bi nu-DIM, The holy house of the gods, its seat was not constructed;

Šu-NIGIN KURKURAgi AABBAama, The whole of the lands was sea.

The nominal and verbal roots of the above extract from the bilingual account of the Creation are in capitals, and the pronominal prefixes and suffixes, with a couple of lengthenings which determine the pronunciations of the nouns, in small letters. This will not only give an idea of the poetical form of the Sumerian legend of the Creation by Merodach and Aruru, but also show how short and concise, as a language, was the speech of Shinar, before Sem supremacy.

SHINE, shīn: The Heb words 'āhal, 'ōr, hālal, zāhar, zāraḥ, yāpha', nāghāh, 'āshath and ḳāran are all tr^{d} "shine." All indicate either the direct or indirect diffusion of beams of light. In a direct and literal sense the word "shine" is used of the heavenly bodies, or of candles, and fire (Job 18 5; 25 5 AV; 29 3; 31 26; 2 K 3 22). In a figurative sense it is used of reflected light or brightness, in any sense (Ex 34 29 f.35; Isa 60 1; Ezk 43 2; Dnl 12 3). God as the sun of righteousness is thus depicted in Ps 50 2. The NT words astráptō, augázō, lámpō and phaínō are tr^{d} "shine." Thus literally it is said of the lightning that it shines (Mt 24 27 AV; Lk 17 24); the word is tropically applied to the life of faith or to men prominent in the kingdom of God (Mt 5 16; Jn 5 35; 2 Cor 4 6; Phil 2 15; 2 Pet 1 19); to the glory of God (Lk 2 9); to angelic appearances (Lk 24 4; Acts 12 7), or to Christ as He appeared to John on Patmos (Rev 1 16).

SHION, shī′on (שִׁיאֹן, shī'ōn; B, Σιωνά, Siōná, A, Σειάν, Seián): A town in the territory of Issachar, named with Shunem, Hapharaim and Anaharath (Josh 19 19). It is possibly identical with Khirbet Sha'īn, near 'Ain esh-Sha'īn, c 4 miles N.W. of Mt. Tabor.

SHIPHI, shī′fī (שִׁפְעִי, shiph'ī; B, Σαφάλ, Saphál, A, Σεφεΐν, Sepheín, Luc., Σωφεί, Sōpheí): A Simeonite prince (1 Ch 4 37 [36]).

SHIPHMITE, shif′mīt. See SHEPHAM; SIPHMOTH.

SHIPHRAH, shif′ra (שִׁפְרָה, shiphrāh, "fairness," "beauty"; LXX Σεπφωρά, Sepphōrá, the rendering also of צִפֹּרָה, çippōrāh, in Ex 2 21): The name of one of the Heb midwives (Ex 1 15). See also ZIPPORAH.

SHIPHTAN, shif′tan (שִׁפְטָן, shiphṭān; B, Σαβαθά, Sabathá, A, Σαβαθάν, Sabathán, F, Σαφατάν, Saphatán, Luc., [Σ]εφαθά, [S]ephathá): An Ephraimite prince (Nu 34 24).

LITERATURE

In the OT the following words are found:

(1) The word most commonly used in Heb for "a ship" is אֳנִיָּה, 'ŏnīyāh (Prov 30 19; Jon 1 3.4), of which the pl. 'ŏnīyōth is found most frequently (Jgs 5 17; 1 K 22 48 f, and many other places).

The collective term for "a navy of ships" is אֳנִי, 'ŏnī (1 K 9 26 f; 10 22, 'ŏnī Tharshīsh, "a navy [of ships] of Tarshish"; but Isa 33 21, 'ŏnī shayiṭ, a "galley with oars").

(2) צִי, çī (Nu 24 24; Ezk 30 9; Isa 33 21), çī 'addīr, "gallant ship"; Dnl 11 30, çīyīm Kittīm, "ships of Kittim."

(3) סְפִינָה, ṣephīnāh, "innermost parts of the ship" RV, "sides of the ship" AV (Jon 1 5, the only place where the word is found).

In Apoc πλοῖον, ploíon, is the usual word (Wisd 14 1; Ecclus 33 2, etc), trd "vessel" in Wisd 14 1, but "ship" elsewhere. For "ship" Wisd 5 10 has ναῦς, naús. "Boat" in 2 Macc 12 3.6 is for σκάφος, skáphos, and "navy" in 1 Macc 1 17; 2 Macc 12 9; 14 1 for στόλος, stólos. In Wisd 14 6 Noah's ark is called a σχεδία, schedía, a "clumsy ship" (the literal tr "raft" in RV is impossible).

In the NT there are four words in use: (1) ναῦς, naús (Acts 27 41, the only place where it occurs, designating the large sea-going vessel in which St. Paul suffered shipwreck). (2) πλοιάριον, ploiárion, "a little boat" (Mk 3 9 and two other places, Jn 6 22 ff; 21 8). (3) πλοῖον, ploíon, "boat" (Mt 4 21.22 and many other places in the Gospels—the ordinary fishing-boat of the Sea of Galilee rendered "boat" uniformly in RV instead of "ship" AV), "ship" (Acts 20 13, and all other places where the ship carrying St. Paul is mentioned, except 27 41, as above). In Jas 3 4; Rev 8 9; 18 17 ff, it is rendered "ship." (4) σκάφη, skáphē, "boat" (Acts 27 16.30.32, where it means the small boat of the ship in which St. Paul was being conveyed as a prisoner to Rome).

Cognate expressions are: "shipmen," אַנְשֵׁי אֳנִיּוֹת, 'anshē 'ŏnīyōth (1 K 9 27); ναῦται, naútai (Acts 27 27.30 AV, "sailors" RV); "mariners," מַלָּחִים, mallāḥīm (Jon 1 15; Ezk 27 9.27.29), שָׁטִים, shāṭīm (Ezk 27 8 AV, "rowers" RV; 27 26, AV and RV); "pilot," חֹבֵל, ḥōbhēl (Jon 1 6; Ezk 27 8.27.28.29); "sailing," "voyage," πλοῦς, ploús (Acts 21 7; 27 9.10, RV "voyage" in all verses).

I. The Hebrews and the Sea.—The Hebrews were a pastoral and agricultural people, and had no inducements to follow a seafaring life. They were possessed of a considerable seaboard along the Mediterranean, but the character of their coast gave little encouragement to navigation. The coast line of the land of Israel from Carmel southward had no bays and no estuaries or river-mouths to offer shelter from storm or to be havens of ships. Solomon landed his timber and other materials for the Temple at Joppa, and tradition has handed down what is called "Solomon's Harbor" there. The builders of the second temple also got timber from Lebanon and conveyed it to Joppa. It was Simon Maccabaeus, however, who built its harbor, and the harbor at Joppa was "the first and only harbor of the Jews" (G. A. Smith, HGHL, 136). Caesarea in NT times was a place of shipping and possessed a harbor which Jos declared to be greater than the Piraeus, but it was Herodian and more Gr and Rom than Jewish. It was mostly inhabited by Greeks (Jos, BJ, III, ix, 1). Now Caesarea has disappeared; and Joppa has only an open roadstead where vessels lie without shelter, and receive and discharge cargo and passengers by means of boats plying between them and the shore. It was in other directions that Israel made acquaintance with the activities of the sea. Of internal navigation, beyond the fishing-boats on the Sea of Galilee which belong exclusively to the NT, the ferry boat on the Jordan (2 S 19 18, עֲבָרָה, 'ăbhārāh) alone receives notice, and even that is not perfectly clear (RVm "convoy," but a "ford" is doubtless meant). It is from Tyre and Egypt and even Assyria and Babylonia, rather than from their own waters, that the Heb prophets and psalmists drew their pictures of seafaring life.

II. Ships in the OT and Apoc.—(1) In early times.—In the early books of the OT there are references connecting certain of the tribes, and these northern tribes, with the activities of the sea. In the "Blessing of Jacob" and in the "Blessing of Moses" Zebulun and Issachar are so connected (Gen 49 13; Dt 33 19); and in Deborah's Song, which is acknowledged to be a very early fragment of Heb lit., Dan and Asher are also spoken of as connected with the life and work of the sea (Jgs 5 17). The Oracle of Balaam (Nu 24 24) looks forward to a day when a fleet from Kittim should take the sea for the destruction of Assyria. "Ships of Kittim" are mentioned in Dnl (11 30). Kittim is referred to in the three greater Prophets (Isa 23 1.12; Jer 2 10; Ezk 27 6). The land of Kittim is Cyprus, and in the references in Isaiah it is associated with Tyre and the ships of Tarshish.

1. Among the Hebrews

(2) During the monarchy.—It is not till the time of the monarchy that the Hebrews begin to figure as a commercial people. Already in the time of David commercial relations had been established between Israel and Tyre (2 S 5 11 f). The friendly coöperation was continued by Solomon, who availed himself not only of the cedar and the fir at Hiram's command on Lebanon, but also of the skilled service of Hiram's men to bring the timber from the mountains to the sea. Hiram also undertook to make the cedar and the fir into rafts (1 K 5 9, דֹּבְרוֹת, dōbhᵉrōth, AV "floats"; 2 Ch 2 16, רַפְסֹדוֹת, raphṣōdhōth, "flotes" AV, "floats" RV) to go by sea and to deliver them to Solomon's men at the place appointed, which the Chronicler tells us was Joppa. From this coöperation in the building of the Temple there grew up a larger connection in the pursuit of sea-borne commerce. It was at Ezion-geber near to Eloth on the Red Sea, in the land of Edom which David had conquered, that Solomon built his fleet, "a navy of ships" (1 K 9 26–28). Hiram joined Solomon in these enterprises which had their center on the Red Sea, and thus the Phoenicians had water communication with the coasts of Arabia and Africa, and even of India. The same partnership existed for the commerce of the West. "For the king [Solomon] had at sea a navy of Tarshish with the navy of Hiram: once every three years came the navy of Tarshish, bringing gold, and silver, ivory, and apes, and peacocks" (1 K 10 22).

Tarshish is the name of the Phoen colony on the river Tartessus, called also Baetis, the modern Guadalquivir. It was the farthest limit of the western world as known to the Hebrews. Attempts have been made to identify it with Tarsus of Cilicia, but they are not convincing. It is conceived of in Heb lit. as remote (Isa 66 19; Jon 1 3; 4 2), as rich (Ps 72 10; Jer 10 9), as powerful in commerce (Ezk 38 13). Ships of Tarshish were no doubt ships actually built for the Tarshish trade (2 Ch 20 36 f; Jon 1 3), but the expression became a general designation for large sea-going vessels to any quarter. Ships of Tarshish made a deep impression upon the imagination of the Heb people. The Psalmist takes it as a proof of the power of Jeh that He breaks the ships of Tarshish with an east wind (Ps 48 7). Isaiah includes them among the great and lofty objects of power and glory which the terror of the Lord would certainly overtake (Isa 2 16). Ezekiel regards them as the caravans that bore the merchandise of the mistress of the sea (27 25). It is in ships of Tarshish that the prophet of the Return sees the exiles borne in crowds to Jerus as their natural home (Isa 60 9).

From Solomon's time onward the kings of Judah retained their hold upon Eloth (1 K 22 48 f; 2 Ch 20 35–37) till it was seized by the Syrians in the days of Ahaz (2 K 16 6).

(3) In later times.—As Solomon had the coöperation of Hiram in securing material and craftsmen for the building of the first Temple, so Joshua and Zerubbabel by the favor of Cyrus obtained timber from Lebanon, and masons and carpenters from Sidon and Tyre for the building of the second. Again, cedar trees were brought from Lebanon by sea to Joppa, and thence conveyed to Jerus (Ezr 3 7).

From Joppa Jonah fled to avoid compliance with God's command to go to Nineveh and preach repentance there (Jon 1 1 ff). He found a ship bound for Tarshish as far toward the W. as Nineveh to the E. The fare (sākhār) paid by him as a passenger, the hold of the ship in which he stowed himself away (ṣᵉphīnāh), the crew (mallāḥīm), the captain or shipmaster (rabh ha-ḥōbhēl), the storm, the angry sea, the terrified mariners and their cry to their gods, and the casting of Jonah overboard to appease the raging waters—all make a lifelike picture.

It was in the time of Simon, the last survivor of the Maccabean brothers, that Joppa became a seaport with a harbor for shipping—"Amid all his glory he took Joppa for a haven, and made it an entrance for the isles of the sea" (1 Macc 14 5). When Simon reared his monument over the sepulcher of his father and brothers at Modin, he set up seven pyramids with pillars, upon which were carved figures of ships to be "seen of all that sail on the sea" (1 Macc 13 29). About this period we hear of ships in naval warfare. When Antiochus IV Epiphanes planned his expedition against Egypt, he had with other armaments "a great navy," presumably ships of war (1 Macc 1 17); and at a later time Antiochus VII speaks expressly of "ships of war" (1 Macc 15 3).

2. Among Neighboring Nations

(1) Egypt.—The Egyptians, like other nations of antiquity, had a great horror of the open sea, although they were expert enough in managing their craft upon the Nile. Pharaoh-necoh built up a powerful navy to serve him both in commerce and in war. See Pharaoh-necoh.

Of explicit references to Egyp ships in the OT there are but few. Isaiah speaks of "vessels of papyrus upon the waters" of the Upper Nile, on board of which are the messengers of Cush or Ethiopia returning to tell the tidings of the overthrow of Assyria to the inhabitants of those remote lands (18 2 AV has "bulrushes" instead of "papyrus"). Ezekiel also, foretelling the overthrow of Egypt, speaks of messengers traveling with the news on swift Nile boats to strike terror into the hearts of the "careless Ethiopians" (30 9). When Job compares his days to "the swift ships" ("the ships of reed" RVm), the allusion is most likely to Egypt's, these being skiffs with a wooden keel and the rest of bulrushes, sufficient to carry one person, or at most two, and light, to travel swiftly (9 26).

(2) Assyria and Babylonia.—The Assyrians and Babylonians were mainly an inland people, but their rivers gave them considerable scope for navigation. The Assyr monuments contain representations of naval engagements and of operations on the seacoast. When Isaiah pictures Jeh as a better defence of Judah than the rivers and streams of Assyria and Egypt are to their people he says, "There Jeh will be with us in majesty, a place of broad rivers and streams, wherein shall go no galley with oars ['ŏnī shayiṭ], neither shall gallant ship [çī 'addīr] pass thereby. . . . . Thy tacklings [ropes, cables] are loosed; they could not strengthen the foot of their mast, they could not spread the sail" (33 21.23). Speaking of Jeh's wonders to be performed toward His people after Babylon had been overthrown, the prophet declares: "Thus saith Jeh, your Redeemer, the Holy One of Israel: For your sake I have sent to Babylon, and I will bring down all of them as fugitives, even the Chaldeans, in the ships of their rejoicing" (43 14). In this case, however, the ships are not war ships, but more probably merchant ships, or ships for pleasure, sailing in the Euphrates.

(3) Phoenicia.—It was from the Phoenicians that the Mediterranean peoples learned seamanship and skill in navigation. It is fitting, therefore, that in his dirge over the downfall of the mistress of the sea, Ezekiel should represent Tyre as a gallant ship, well built, well furnished, and well manned, broken by the seas in the depths of the waters, fallen into the heart of the seas in the day of her ruin. Ezekiel's description (ch 27, with Davidson's notes) brings together more of the features of the ship of antiquity than any other that has come down to us. Her builders have made her perfect in beauty with planks of fir or cypress, mast of cedar, oars of the oak of Bashan, benches or deck of ivory inlaid with boxwood, sail of fine linen with broidered work from Egypt, and an awning of blue and purple from the coastlands of Elishah (possibly Sicily). She is manned with oarsmen of Sidon and Arvad, pilots of the wise men of Tyre, calkers from Gebal to stop up the cracks and seams in her timbers, mariners and men of war from other lands who enhanced her beauty by hanging up the shield and helmet within her. She is freighted with the most varied cargo, the produce of the lands around, her customers, or as they are called, her traffickers, being Tarshish in the far W., Sheba and Arabia in the S., Haran and Asshur in the E., Javan, which is Greece, and Togarmah, which is Armenia, in the N.

One or two of the particulars of this description may be commented upon. (a) As regards rigging, the Phoen ships of the time of Ezekiel, as seen in Assyr representations, had one mast with one yard and carried a square sail. Egyp ships on the Red Sea about the time of the Exodus, from reliefs of the XIXth Dynasty, had one mast and two yards, and carried also one large square sail. The masts and yards were made of fir, or of pine, and the sails of linen, but the fiber of papyrus was employed as well as flax in the manufacture of sail-cloth. The sail had also to serve "for an ensign" (lenēs, Ezk 27 7). "The flag proper," says Davidson (ad loc.), "seems not to have been used in ancient navigation; its purpose was served by the sail, as for example at the battle of Actium the ship of Antony was distinguished by its purple sail."

(b) As regards the crew, in the two-banked Phoen ship the rowers of the first bank work their oars over the gunwale, and those of the second through portholes lower down, so that each may have free play for his oar. The calkers were those who filled up seams or cracks in the timbers with tow and covered them over with tar or wax, after the manner of the instruction given to Noah regarding the Ark: "Thou . . . . shalt pitch it within and without with pitch" (Gen 6 14).

(c) As regards cargo, it is to be noted that "the persons of men," that is, slaves, formed an article of merchandise in which Javan, Tubal, and Meshech, countries to the N., traded with Tyre.

3. General References

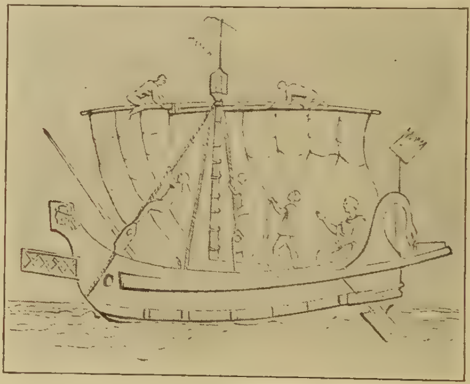
Of general references to shipping and seafaring life there are comparatively few in the OT. In his great series of Nature-pictures in Ps 104, the Psalmist finds a place for the sea and ships (vs 25 ff), and in Ps 107 there is a picture of the storm overtaking them that go down to the sea in ships, and of the deliverance that comes to them when God "bringeth them into their desired haven" (vs 23 ff). In the Book of Prov the ideal woman who brings her food from far is like "the merchant ships" (31 14). In the same book the drunkard, because of his unnatural insensibility to danger, is likened to a man "that lieth down in the midst of the sea, or as he that lieth upon the top of a mast" (23 34); and among the inscrutable things of the world the writer includes "the way of a ship in the midst of the sea" (30 19). In Wisd, human life is described "as a ship passing through the billowy water, whereof, when it is gone by, there is no trace to be found, neither pathway of its keel in the billows" (5 10). The same book notes it as a striking example of the case of a divine and beneficent Providence that "men intrust their lives to a little piece of wood, and passing through the surge on a raft are brought safe to land" (14 1–5). The Jews like the Egyptians and the Assyrians had a natural shrinking from the sea, and Ecclesiasticus interprets their feeling when he says: "They that sail on the sea tell of the danger thereof; and when we hear it with our ears, we marvel" (43 24).

1. In the Gospels

III. Ships in the NT.—It is the fishing-boats of the Sea of Galilee which exclusively occupy attention in the Gospels. In the time of Our Lord's ministry in Galilee the shores of the Sea were densely peopled, and there must have been many boats engaged in the fishing industry. Bethsaida at the northern end of the Lake and Tarichaea at the southern end were great centers of the trade. The boats were probably of a size and build similar to the few employed on the Lake today, which are between 20 and 30 ft. in length and 7 ft. in breadth. The word "launch," of putting a boat or a ship into the sea, has disappeared from RV, except in Lk 8 22, where it is more appropriate to an inland lake. They were propelled by oars, but no doubt also made use of the sail when the wind was favorable (Lk 8 23), though the pictures which we have in the Gospels are mostly of the boatmen toiling in rowing in the teeth of a gale (Mk 6 48), and struggling with the threatening waves (Mt 14 24). In the boat on which Jesus and the disciples were crossing the Lake after the feeding of the 5,000, Jesus was in the stern "asleep on the cushion" (Mk 4 38, AV "a pillow"; Gr proskephálaion, "headrest"). More than once Jesus made special use of a boat. As He was by the seashore a great concourse of people from all parts made it desirable that "a small boat" (ploiarion) should be in attendance off the shore to receive Him in case of need, though He does not seem to have required it (Mk 3 9). On another occasion, when the crowds were still greater, He went into a boat and sat "in the sea" with the multitude on the sloping beach before Him (Mk 4 1; Lk 5 3). This boat is said in St. Luke's narrative to have been Simon's, and it seems from references to it as "the boat" on other occasions to have been generally at the disposal of Jesus.

2. In the Acts of the Apostles

It is St. Paul's voyages which yield us the knowledge that we possess from Bib. sources of ships in NT times. They are recorded for us in the Acts by St. Luke, who, as Sir William Ramsay puts it, had the true Gr feeling for the sea (St. Paul the Traveller, 21). In St. Luke's writings there are many nautical terms, peculiar to him, used with great exactitude and precision.



Roman Ship from Tomb at Pompeii.

When St. Paul had appealed to Caesar and was proceeding to Rome in charge of Julius, the centurion, along with other prisoners, a ship of Adramyttium, a coasting vessel, carried the party from Caesarea along the Syrian coast, northward of Cyprus, past Cilicia and Pamphylia, to Myra of Lycia. There the centurion found a ship of Alexandria sailing for Italy, one of the great corn fleet carrying grain from Egypt for the multitudes of Rome. (After the capture of Jerus the emperor Titus returned to Italy in such a vessel, touching at Rhegium and landing at Puteoli.) The size of the vessel is indicated by the fact that there were 276 persons on board, crew and passengers all told (Acts 27 37). St. Luke has made no note of the name of this or of the previous vessels in which St. Paul had voyaged. Of the presumably larger vessel, also an Alexandrian corn ship bound for Rome, which had wintered in Melita, and which afterward took on board the shipwrecked party (Acts 28 11), "the sign" (παράσημον, parásēmon) is given, and she is called "The Twin Brothers." The expression shows that it was in painting or relief; a figurehead, with the Twin Brothers represented, would be given by ἐπίσημον, epísēmon. The cargo (φορτίον, phortíon, Acts 27 10, AV and RV "lading") in this case was wheat (27 38), but another word is used, γόμος, gómos, by St. Luke of a ship's load of varied wares (Acts 21 3; cf Rev 18 11 ff).

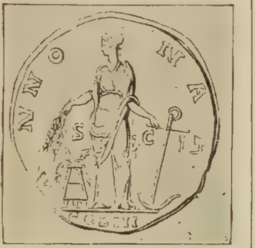
Of those engaged in handling the ship we find (ver 11) the master (κυβερνήτης, kubernḗtēs), the owner (ναύκληρος, naúklēros, although this expression seems not quite consistent with the ownership of a corn ship of the imperial service, and Ramsay's distinction between the words, making the former "sailing-master" and the latter "captain," may be better), the sailors (ver 30, who treacherously sought to lower the ship's boat on the pretence of laying out anchors from the "foreship" or prow, and to get away from the doomed vessel).

Of operations belonging to the navigation of the vessel in the storm there were (1) the taking on board of the ship's boat and securing it with ropes (ver 16, in which operation St. Luke seems to have taken part; cf ver 32), (2) the undergirding of the ship (ver 17, using helps, that is taking measures of relief and adopting the expedient, only resorted to in extremities, of passing cables under the keel of the ship to keep the hull together and to preserve the timbers from starting), (3) the lowering of the gear (ver 17, reducing sail, taking down the mainsail and the main yard), (4) throwing freight overboard and later casting out the tackling of the ship (ver 19), (5) taking soundings (ver 28), (6) letting go four anchors from the stern (ver 29, stern-anchoring being very unusual, but a necessity in the circumstances), (7) further lightening the ship by throwing the wheat into the sea (ver 38), (8) cutting the anchor cables, unlashing the rudders, hoisting up the foresail to the wind, and holding straight for the beach (ver 40).



Coin of Antoninus Pius, Showing Anchor.

Of the parts of the ship's equipment there are mentioned "the sounding lead" (βολίς, bolís, though it is the vb. which is here used), "the anchors" (ἄγκυραι, ágkurai, of which every ship carried several, and which at successive periods have been made of stone, iron, lead and perhaps other metals, each having two flukes and being held by a cable or a chain), "the rudders" (πηδάλια, pēdália, of which every ship had two for steering, which in this case had been lifted out of the water and secured by "bands" to the side of the ship and unlashed when the critical moment came), "the foresail" (ἀρτέμων, artémōn, not the mainsail, but the small sail at the bow of the vessel which at the right moment was hoisted to the wind to run her ashore), and "the boat" (σκάφη, skáphē, which had been in tow in the wake of the vessel, according to custom still prevalent in those seas—coasting-vessels being sometimes becalmed, when the crew get into the small boat and take the ship in tow, using the oars to get her round a promontory or into a position more favorable for the wind). The season for navigation in those seas in ancient times was from April to October. During the winter the vessels were laid up, or remained in the shelter of some suitable haven. The reason for this was not simply the tempestuous character of the weather, but the obscuration of the heavens which prevented observations being taken for the steering of the ship (Acts 27 20).

3. In Other Books

In 2 Cor 11 25 St. Paul mentions among sufferings he had endured for Christ's sake that thrice he had suffered shipwreck, and that he had been "a night and a day in the deep," implying that he had been in danger of his life clinging to a spar, or borne upon a hurriedly constructed raft. It may be a reminiscence of the sea when St. Paul in the very earliest of his Epp. (1 Thess 4 16), speaking of the coming of the Lord, says "The Lord himself shall descend from heaven, with a shout" (ἐν κελεύσματι, en keleúsmati), where the picture is that of the κελευστής, keleustḗs, giving the time to the rowers on board a ship. Although ὑπηρέτης, hupērétēs, was "an underrower" and ὑπηρεσία, hupēresía, "the crew of a ship," as contrasted with κυβερνήτης, kubernḗtēs, "the sailing-master," the derived meaning of "servant" or "officer" has lost in the NT all trace of its origin (Mt 5 25; Lk 1 2 and many passages; cf στέλλειν, stéllein, and συστέλλειν, sustéllein, where the idea of "furling" or "shifting a sail" is entirely lost: 1 Cor 7 29; 2 Cor 8 20).

Figurative: In He the hope of the gospel is figured as "an anchor . . . . sure and stedfast, and entering into that which is within the veil" (6 19, esp. with Ebrard's note in Alford, ad loc.). St. James, showing the power of little things, adduces the ships, large though they be, and driven by fierce winds, turned about by a very small "rudder" (πηδάλιον, pēdálion), as "the impulse of the steersman willeth" (Jas 3 4). In Rev there is a representation of the fall of Babylon in language reminiscent of the fall of Tyre (Ezk 27), in which lamentations arise from the merchants of the earth who can no more buy her varied merchandise (τόν γόμον, tón gómon, "cargo" RVm), and shipmasters and passengers and seafaring people look in terror and grief upon the smoke of her burning (Rev 18 12–18).

LITERATURE.—The usual books on Gr and Rom antiquities furnish descriptions and illustrations. Works on the monuments like Layard, Nineveh, II, 379 ff; Maspero, Ancient Egypt and Assyria; Ball, Light from the East, and Reissner, Cairo Museum Catalogue, "Models of Ships and Boats," 1913, contain descriptions and figured representations which are instructive. On shipping and navigation in classical antiquity Smith of Jordanhill, Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, is still the standard authority.

SHISHA, shī′sha (שִׁישָׁא, shīshā'): One of Solomon's officers of state (1 K 4 3).

SHISHAK, shī′shak (שִׁישַׁק, shīshaḳ [1 K 14 25]; Σουσακείμ, Sousakeím): Sheshonk or Sheshenq I,

1. Shishak, 952–930 BC

as he is called on the monuments, the founder of the XXIId Dynasty, was in all probability of Libyan origin. It is possible that his claim to the throne was that of the sword, but it is more likely that he acquired it by marriage with a princess of the dynasty preceding. On the death of Pasebkhanu II, the last of the kings of the XXIst Dynasty, 952 BC, Shishak ascended the throne, with an efficient army and a well-filled treasury at his command. He was a warlike prince and cherished dreams of Asiatic dominion.

2. Patron of Jeroboam

He had not long been seated on the throne when Jeroboam the son of Nebat, of the tribe of Ephraim, whom Solomon had promoted but afterward had cause to suspect, fled from the displeasure of his sovereign to the court of Shishak (1 K 11 26 ff). There Jeroboam remained till the death of Solomon, when he returned to Canaan, and, on Rehoboam's returning an unsatisfactory answer to the people's demands for relief from their burdens, headed the revolt of the Ten Tribes, over whom he was chosen king with his capital at Shechem (1 K 12 25 ff). Whether there was not in the XXIst Dynasty some kind of suzerainty of Egypt over Pal, when Solomon married Pharaoh's daughter and received with her Gezer as a dowry, seems not to be clearly established.

It is, however, natural that Jeroboam's patron in the day of adversity should take sides with him against Rehoboam, now that the kingdom was divided. Active support of Jeroboam would be in the line of his dreams of an eastern empire.

3. Syrian Campaign

So it came to pass that in the 5th year of Rehoboam, Shishak came up against Jerus with 1,200 chariots, and 60,000 horsemen, and people without number out of Egypt, the Libyans, Sukkiim, and Ethiopians, and took the fenced cities of Judah, and came to Jerus. At the preaching of the prophet Shemaiah, Rehoboam and his people repented, and Jerus was saved from destruction, though not from plunder nor from servitude, for he became Shishak's servant (2 Ch 12 8). Shishak took away the treasures of the house of the Lord and the treasures of the king's house, carrying off among the most precious of the spoils all the shields of gold which Solomon had made (1 K 14 25 ff; 2 Ch 12 1–9). From the Scripture narrative it does not appear that there was any occupation of Pal by the Egyp forces on this occasion.

4. Shishak's Record at Karnak

There is, however, a remarkable contemporary record of the campaign engraved on the south wall of the Temple of Amon at Karnak by Shishak himself. Not only is the expedition recorded, but there is a list of districts and towns of Pal granted to his victories by Amon-Ra and the goddess of Thebes engraved there. A number of towns mentioned in the Book of Josh have been identified; and among the names of the list are Rabbath, Taanach, Gibeon, Mahanaim, Beth-horon and other towns both of Israel and Judah. That names of places in the Northern Kingdom are mentioned in the list does not imply that Shishak had directed his armies against Jeroboam and plundered his territories. It was the custom in antiquity for a victorious monarch to include among conquered cities any place that paid tribute or was under subjection, whether captured in war or not; and it was sufficient reason for Shishak to include these Israelite places that Jeroboam, as seems probable, had invited him to come to his aid. Among the names in the list was "Jud-hamalek"—Yudhmalk on the monuments—which was at first believed to represent the king of Judah, with a figure which passed for Rehoboam. Being, however, a place-name, it is now recognized to be the town Yehudah, belonging to the king. On the death of Shishak his successor assumed a nominal suzerainty over the land of Canaan.

SHITRAI, shit′rī, shit-rā′ī, shit′rȧ-ī (שִׁטְרַי, shiṭray): A Sharonite, David's chief shepherd (1 Ch 27 29).

SHITTAH, shit′a, TREE (שִׁטָּה, shiṭṭāh; LXX ξύλον ἄσηπτον, xúlon ásēpton; RV ACACIA TREE [Isa 41 19]); SHITTIM WOOD (עֲצֵי שִׁטִּים, ʽăçē shiṭṭīm; RV ACACIA WOOD [Ex 25 5.10.13; 26 15.26; 27 1.6; Dt 10 3]): The word was originally shinṭah, derived from the Arab. sanṭ, now a name confined to one species of acacia, Acacia nilotica (N.O. Leguminosae), but possibly was once a more inclusive term. The A. nilotica is at present confined to the Sinaitic peninsula and to Egypt. Closely allied species, the A. tortilis and A. seyal, both classed together under the Arab. name sayyāl, are plentiful in the valleys about the Dead Sea from Engedi southward. Those who have ridden from ʽAin Jidy to Jebel Usdum will never forget these most striking features of the landscape. They are most picturesque trees with their gnarled trunks, sometimes 2 ft. thick, their twisted, thorny branches, which often give the whole tree an umbrella-like form, and their fine bipinnate leaves with minute leaflets. The curiously twisted pods and the masses of gum arabic which exude in many parts are also peculiar features. The trees yield a valuable, hard, close-grained timber, not readily attacked by insects.

SHITTIM, shit′im (הַשִּׁטִּים, ha-shiṭṭīm, "the acacias"; Σαττείν, Sattein):

(1) This marked the last camping-ground of Israel before they crossed the Jordan to begin the conquest of Western Pal. Here it was that the people fell into the snare set for them by the satanic counsel of Balaam, who thus brought upon them greater evil than all his prohibited curses could have done (Nu 25 1 ff; 31 16). In Nu 33 49 it is called Abel-shittim. It was from Shittim that Joshua sent the spies to view out the land and Jericho (Josh 2 1); and from this point the host moved forward to the river (3 1). The place is mentioned by Micah in a passage of some difficulty (6 5): after "what Balaam the son of Beor answered," perhaps some such phrase as "remember what I did" has fallen out. This would then be a reference to the display of Divine power in arresting the flow of Jordan until the host had safely crossed. Jos places the camp "near Jordan where the city Abila now stands, a place full of palm trees" (Ant, IV, viii, 1). Onom says Shittim was near to Mt. Peor (Fogor). It may possibly be identical with Khirbet el-Kefrain, about 6 miles S. of the Jordan, on the lip of Wâdy Seisebān, where there are many acacias.

(2) In Joel 3 18 we read of the valley of Shittim which is to be watered by a fountain coming forth of the house of the Lord. It must therefore be sought on the W. of the Jordan. The waters from the Jerus district are carried to the Dead Sea down the Wâdy which continues the Brook Kidron: Wâdy en-Nār. The acacia is found plentifully in the lower reaches of this valley, which may possibly be intended by the prophet.

SHIZA, shī′za (שִׁיזָא, shīzā'; Σαιζά, Saizá): A Reubenite, one of David's leading warriors (1 Ch 11 42).

SHOA, shō′a (שֹׁעַ, shōaʽ; Σουέ, Soué): A people named in Ezk 23 23 in association with Babylonians, Chaldaeans and Assyrians. Schrader identifies with the Sutū of the inscriptions (E. of the Tigris).

SHOBAB, shō′bab (שׁוֹבָב, shōbhābh; Σωβάβ, Sōbáb):

(1) One of the sons of David (2 S 5 14; 1 Ch 3 5; 14 4).

(2) A son of Caleb (1 Ch 2 18).

SHOBACH, shō′bak .(שׁוֹבָךְ, shōbhakh; Σωβάκ, Sōbák): Captain of the Syrian host (2 S 10 16.18); but "Shophach" (שׁוֹפָךְ, shōphakh) in 1 Ch 19 16.18.

SHOBAI, shō′bī, shȯ-bā′ī, shō′bȧ-ī (שֹׁבָי, shōbhāy; B, ᾿Αβαού, Abaoú, A, Luc., Σωβαί, Sōbaí): The head of one of the families which returned from the Bab captivity (Ezr 2 42; Neh 7 45).

SHOBAL, shō′bal (שׁוֹבָל, shōbhāl, "overflowing"; Σωβάλ, Sōbál, with variants):

(1) An Edomite name mentioned in connection with Lotan, Zibeon and Anah, as that of a "son" of Seir (Gen 36 20), the father of a clan (ver 23), and a Horite "duke" ('allūph) (ver 29; 1 Ch 1 38.40).

(2) A Calebite, the father (possibly of the inhabitants) of Kiriath-jearim (1 Ch 2 50.52).

(3) A Judahite, perhaps to be identified with (2) above (1 Ch 4 1 f).

SHOBEK, shō′bek (שׁוֹבֵק, shōbhēḳ; Σωβήκ, Sōbḗk): One of those who sealed the covenant under Nehemiah after the Bab captivity (Neh 10 24).

SHOBI, shō′bī (שֹׁבִי, shōbhī; Οὐεσβεί, Ouesbeí): One of those who remained faithful to David during the rebellion of Absalom (2 S 17 27).

SHOCHOH, shō′kō (שׂוֹכֹה, sōkhōh, B, Σοκχώθ, Sokchōth, A, ᾿Οκχώ, Okchō): This in 1 S 17 1 AV is a variant of SOCOH (q.v.).

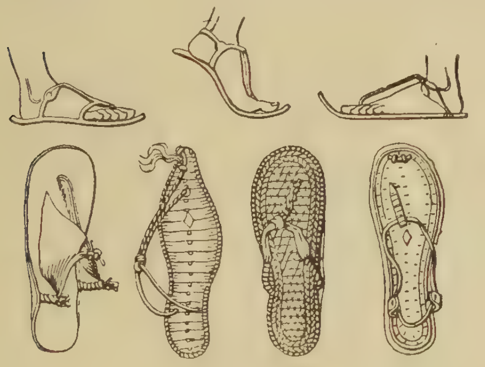
SHOE, shōō, SHOE-LATCHET, shōō′lach-et (נַעַל, na'al, lit. "that which is fastened," with denominative vb. נָעַל, nā'al, "to provide with shoes" [2 Ch 28 15; Ezk 16 10]; ὑπόδημα, hupódēma [Sir 46 19; Mt 3 11, etc], from the vb. ὑποδέω, hupodéō [Mk 6 9; Eph 6 15], "to bind under," σανδάλιον, sandálion, "sandal" [Jth 10 4; 16 9; Mk 6 9; Acts 12 8]; AV, RVm also have "shoe" for מִנְעָל, min'āl, "bar" [so RV text] in Dt 33 25; the "latchet" is either שְׂרוֹךְ, s^{e}rōkh, "twisted thing" [Gen 14 23; Isa 5 27], or ἱμάς, himás, "leather thong" [Mk 1 7; Lk 3 16; Jn 1 27]): The na'al was a simple piece of leather tied on the foot with the s^{e}rōkh, so easy of construction that its low cost was proverbial (Am 2 6; 8 6; Sir 46 19; cf Gen 14 23), and to be without it was a sign of extreme poverty (2 Ch 28 15; Isa 20 2). Women, however, might have ornamental sandals (Cant 7 1; Jth 16 9), and Ezekiel names "sealskin" (16 10) as a particularly luxurious material, but the omission of sandals from the list of Isa 3 18–23 shows that they were not commonly made articles of great expense. The hupodēma was likewise properly a sandal, but the word was also used to denote a shoe that covered the foot. The contrast between hupodēma in Mt 10 10 and sandalion in Mk 6 9 seems to show that this meaning is not unknown in the NT, the "shoe" being regarded as an article of luxury (cf Lk 15 22). But in Mt 3 11 and ‖'s, only the sandal can be meant.



Egyptian Sandals.

Sandals were not worn indoors, so that putting them on was a sign of readiness for activity (Ex 12 11; Acts 12 8; Eph 6 15), the more wealthy having them brought (Mt 3 11) and fastened (Mk 1 7 and ‖'s) by slaves. When one entered a house they were removed; all the more, naturally, on entering a sanctuary (Ex 3 5; Josh 5 15; Acts 7 33). Mourners, however, did not wear them even out of doors, as a sign of grief (Ezk 24 17.23), perhaps for the same reason that other duties of the toilet were neglected (2 S 12 20, etc). A single long journey wore out a pair of sandals (Josh 9 5.13), and the preservation of "the latchet of their shoes" from being broken (Isa 5 27) would require almost miraculous help.

Ruth 4 7 f states as a "custom in former times in Israel," that when any bargain was closed "a man drew off his shoe, and gave it to his neighbor." This was of course simply a special form of earnest-money, used in all transactions. In Dt 25 9 f the custom appears in a different light. If a man refused to perform his duty to his deceased brother's wife, the elders of the city were to remove his shoe and disgrace him publicly, "And his name shall be called in Israel, The house of him that hath his shoe loosed." The removal of the shoe is apparently connected with the rite in Ruth 4 7 as a renunciation of the man's privilege. But the general custom seems to have become obsolete, for the removal of the shoe is now a reproach.

The meaning of Ps 60 8 ‖ 108 9, "Upon [m "unto"] Edom will I cast my shoe," is uncertain. עַל, 'al, may mean either "upon" or "unto." If the former, some (otherwise unsubstantiated) custom of asserting ownership of land may be meant. If the latter, the meaning is "Edom I will treat as a slave," to whom the shoes are cast on entering a house.

SHOHAM, shō′ham (שֹׁהַם, shōham, "onyx"; B, ᾿Ισοάμ, Isoám, A, ᾿Ισσοάμ, Issoám): One of the sons of Merari (1 Ch 24 27).

SHOMER, shō′mẽr (שׁוֹמֵר, shōmẽr):

(1) The father of one of the conspirators who killed Joash (2 K 12 21). See SHIMEATH.

(2) One of the sons of Heber of the tribe of Asher (1 Ch 7 32). See SHEMER.

SHOPHACH, shō′fak. See SHOBACH.

SHOPHAN, shō′fan (שׁוֹפָן, shōphān). See ATROTH-SHOPHAN.

SHORE, shōr: (1) חוֹף, ḥōph, always of the Mediterranean, variously tr^{d} "haven," "beach," "shore," "sea-shore," "coast," "sea coast" (Gen 49 13; Dt 1 7; Josh 9 1; Jgs 5 17; Jer 47 7; Ezk 25 16). (2) שָׂפָה, sāphāh, lit. "lip"; cf Arab. شَفَة, shafat, "lip"; of the sand upon the seashore, a figure of multitude (Gen 22 17; Ex 14 30; Josh 11 4; Jgs 7 12; 1 S 13 5; 1 K 4 29); the shore of the Red Sea or Gulf of 'Aḳabah by Ezion-geber (1 K 9 26; 2 Ch 8 17); the brink of the River Nile (Gen 41 3.17); the edge (AV "brink") of the valley of Arnon (Dt 2 36). (3) קָצֶה, ḳāçeh, lit. "end," "extremity," the uttermost part (AV "shore") of the Salt Sea (Josh 15 2); קְצֵה הָאָרֶץ, ḳ^{e}çēh hā-'āreç, "the end of the earth" (Ps 46 9); cf Arab. أَقَاصِي ٱلْأَرْض, 'aḳâṣî-l-'arḍ, "the uttermost parts of the earth." (4) χεῖλος, cheîlos, lit. "lip," "as the sand which is by the seashore" (He 11 12). (5) αἰγιαλός, aigialós, the beach (AV "shore") of the Sea of Galilee (Mt 13 2.48; Jn 21 4); of the Mediterranean (Acts 21 5; 27 39.40). (6) ἆσσον παρελέγοντο τὴν Κρήτην, ásson parelégonto tḗn Krḗtēn, doubtful reading, "sailed along Crete, close in shore" (AV "sailed along by Crete") (Acts 27 13). See Coast; Haven; Sand.

SHORTEN, shôr't'n: The Heb word ḳāçar and the Gr kolobóō lit. indicate abbreviation of time or space (Ps 89 45; Prov 10 27; Ezk 42 5); figuratively they point to limitation of power or of suffering (Nu 11 23; Isa 50 2; 59 1; Mt 24 22; Mk 13 20).

SHOULDER, shōl'dẽr (שְׁכֶם, sh^{e}khem, כָּתֵף, kāthēph, זְרֹעַ or זְרוֹעַ, z^{e}rō^{a}', זְרֹעָה or זְרוֹעָה, z^{e}rō'āh, שׁוֹק, shōḳ; ὦμος, ōmos, βραχίων, brachíōn [Sir 7 31 only]): The meanings of the Heb words are rather varied. The first (sh^{e}khem) has perhaps the widest application. It is used for the part of the body on which heavy loads are carried (Gen 21 14; 24 15.45; Ex 12 34; Josh 4 5; Jgs 9 48). King Saul's impressive personality is thus described: "There was not among the children of Israel a goodlier person than he: from his shoulders and upward he was higher than any of the people" (1 S 9 2; 10 23). To carry loads on the shoulder or to have "a staff on the shoulder" is expressive of subjection and servitude, yea, of oppression and cruel punishment, and the removal of such burdens or of the rod of the oppressor connotes delivery and freedom (Isa 9 4; 14 25).

Figuratively: The shoulders also bear responsibility and power. Thus it is said of King Messiah, that "the government shall be upon his shoulder" (Isa 9 6) and "the key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder; and he shall open, and none shall shut; and he shall shut, and none shall open" (22 22). Job declares that he will refute all accusations of unlawful conduct made against him, in the words: "Oh .... that I had the indictment which mine adversary hath written! Surely I would carry it upon my shoulder" (Job 31 35 f).

The Heb word kāthēph comes very close in meaning to the above, though it is occasionally used in the sense of arm- and shoulder-piece of a garment. Like Heb sh^{e}khem, it is used to describe the part of the body accustomed to carry loads. On it the Levites carried the implements of the sanctuary (Nu 7 9; 1 Ch 15 15; 2 Ch 35 3). Oriental mothers and fathers carried their children on the shoulder astride (Isa 49 22; cf 60 4); thus also the little bundle of the poor is borne (Ezk 12 6.7.12). The loaded shoulder is likely to be "worn" or chafed under the burden (29 18). In the two passages of the NT in which we find the Gr equivalent of shoulder (ōmos, fairly common in Apoc), it corresponds most closely with this use (Mt 23 4; Lk 15 5). Of the shoulders of animals the word kāthēph is used in Ezk 34 21 (of sheep, where, however, men are intended) and in Isa 30 6 (of asses).

Stubborn opposition and unwillingness is expressed by "withdrew the shoulder" (Neh 9 29), or "pulled away the shoulder" (Zec 7 11), where the marginal rendering is "they gave [or "turned"] a stubborn shoulder." Contrast "bow the shoulder," i.e. "submit" (Bar 2 21). Cf "stiffnecked"; see Neck. Somewhat difficult for the understanding of Occidentals is the poetical passage in the blessing of Moses: "Of Benjamin he said, The beloved of Jeh shall dwell in safety by him; he covereth him all the day long, and he dwelleth between his shoulders" (Dt 33 12). The "shoulders" refer here to the mountain saddles and proclivities of the territory of Benjamin between which Jerus, the beloved of Jeh, which belonged to Judah, lay nestling close upon the confines of the neighboring tribe, or even built in part on ground belonging to Benjamin.

Much less frequently than the above-mentioned words, we find z^{e}rō^{a}', z^{e}rō'āh, which is used of the "boiled shoulder of the ram" which was a wave offering at the consecration of a Nazirite (Nu 6 19) and of one of the priestly portions of the sacrifice (Dt 18 3). In Sir 7 31 this portion is called brachiōn, properly "arm," but both AV and RV translate "shoulder." Regarding the wave and heave offerings see Sacrifice. AV frequently translates Heb shōḳ, lit. "leg," "thigh" (q.v.) by "shoulder," which RV occasionally retains in the margin (e.g. Nu 6 20).

SHOULDER-BLADE, shōl'dẽr-blād (שִׁכְמָה, shikhmāh): "Then let my shoulder [kāthēph] fall from the shoulder-blade [shikhmāh], and mine arm [z^{e}rō^{a}'] be broken from the bone [ḳāneh]" (Job 31 22). The Heb word is the fem. form of sh^{e}khem (see Shoulder). It is found only in this passage.

SHOULDER-PIECE, shōl'dẽr-pēs (כָּתֵף, kāthēph): The word designates the two straps or pieces of cloth which passed from the back of the ephod (see Ephod) of the high priest over the shoulder and were fastened at the front. These shoulder-pieces seem to have been made of a precious texture of linen (or byssos) with threads of gold, blue, purple and scarlet, to which two onyx (or beryl) stones were attached bearing the names of six tribes of Israel each. These are called the "stones of memorial" (Ex 39 18). On these straps there were also fastened the plaited or woven bands ("wreathed chains") from which, by means of two golden rings, the breastplate was suspended. It is by no means clear from the descriptions (Ex 28 7.12.25; 39 4.7.18.20) how we have to imagine the form and attachment of these shoulder-pieces. It has been thought that the ephod might be of Egyp origin, which is not very probable, though V. Ancessi, Annales de philosophie chrétienne, 1872, 45 ff, reproduces some representations from the great work of Lepsius, Denkmäler, where costly royal garments have two shoulder straps, like the ephod. Usually Egyp garments have no shoulder strap, or at most one.

SHOVEL, shuv''l: (1) רַחַת, raḥath, is a wooden shovel used on the threshing-floor for winnowing the grain (Isa 30 24). (2) יָע, yā', is used in various passages to indicate some instrument employed to carry away ashes from the altar (Ex 27 3; 38 3; Nu 4 14; 1 K 7 40.45; 2 K 25 14; 2 Ch 4 11.16; Jer 52 18). It was very likely a small shovel like those used in connection with modern fireplaces for cleaning away the ashes (cf Heb yā'āh, "to sweep away") or for carrying live coals to start a new fire. (3) יָתֵד, yāthēdh (Dt 23 13 RVm).

SHOW, shō. See Shew.

SHOWBREAD, TABLE OF. See Shewbread, Table of.

SHOWER, shou′ẽr: (1) רְבִיבִים, r^ebhībhīm, a pl. form apparently denoting gentle rain, usually used figuratively, as in Dt 32 2; Ps 72 6; Mic 5 7. (2) גֶּשֶׁם, geshem, used of gentle rain in Job 37 6: "shower of rain," AV "small rain"; used of the flood in Gen 7 12. Figuratively, of blessing, "showers of blessing" (Ezk 34 26); of destruction: "There shall be an overflowing shower in mine anger, and great hailstones in wrath to consume it" (Ezk 13 13). (3) זֶרֶם, zerem, usually storm or tempest (cf Isa 4 6; 28 2): "They are wet with the showers of the mountain" (Job 24 8). (4) ὄμβρος, ómbros (Lk 12 54). Rain is unknown in Pal in the long summer of 5 or 6 months. A few showers usually fall in September, succeeded by fine weather for some weeks before the beginning of the heavy and long-continued winter rains.

SHRINE, shrīn (ναός, naós): In Acts 19 24 small models of temples for Diana.

SHROUD, shroud (חֹרֶשׁ, ḥōresh, "bough"): Winding-sheet for the dead. See Burial. Used in AV, ERV Ezk 31 3 in the rare old sense of "shelter," "covering." ARV has "a forest-like shade" (חֹרֶשׁ, ḥōresh, "wood," "wooded height") (Isa 17 9, etc). Cf Milton, Comus, 147.

SHRUB, shrub (שִׂיחַ, si^aḥ [Gen 21 15]). See Bush, (2).

SHUA, SHUAH, shōō′a:

(1) (שׁוּעַ, shū^aʽ, "prosperity"): A Canaanite whose daughter Judah took to wife (Gen 38 2.12; 1 Ch 2 3; see Bath-shua).

(2) (שׁוּעָא, shūʽā', "prosperity"): Daughter of Heber, an Asherite (1 Ch 7 32).

(3) (שׁוּחַ, shū^aḥ, "depression"): A son of Keturah by Abraham (Gen 25 2; 1 Ch 1 32), and his posterity. See Bildad.

(4) A brother of Caleb (1 Ch 4 11). See Shuhah.

SHUAL, shōō′al (שׁוּעָל, shūʽāl): An Asherite (1 Ch 7 36).

SHUAL, LAND OF (אֶרֶץ שׁוּעָל, 'ereç shūʽāl; ἡ Σωγάλ, hē Sōgál): From their encampment at Michmash the Philis sent out marauding bands, one going westward toward Beth-horon, another eastward, "the way of the border that looketh down upon the valley of Zeboim." The pass to the S. was held against them by Israel. The third party therefore went northward, turning "unto the way that leadeth to Ophrah, unto the land of Shual" (1 S 13 17 f). Ophrah is probably identical with eṭ-Ṭaiyibeh, a village which lies some 5 miles E. of Beitīn (Bethel). It is in this district therefore that the land of Shual must be sought, but no definite identification is possible.

SHUBAEL, shōō′bā̊-el, shōō-bā′el (שׁוּבָאֵל, shūbhā'ēl):

(1) A Levite, son of Amram (1 Ch 24 20); one of the leaders of song in the temple (1 Ch 25 20). See Shebuel; Gray, HPN, 310.

(2) A son of Heman (1 Ch 25 4). See Shebuel.

SHUHAH, shōō′ha (שׁוּחָה, shūḥāh, "depression"): A brother of Caleb (1 Ch 4 11).

SHUHAM, shōō′ham (שׁוּחָם, shūḥām): Son of Dan, ancestor of the Shuhamites (Nu 26 42 f). In Gen 46 23 called "Hushim."

SHUHITE, shōō′hīt (שׁוּחִי, shūḥī): Cognomen of Bildad, one of Job's friends (Job 2 11; 8 1; 18 1; 25 1; 42 9). The place referred to cannot be definitely located. See Bildad; Shuah.

SHULAMMITE, shōō′la-mīt (Cant 6 13, AV "Shulamite"). See Shunammite.

SHUMATHITES, shōō′math-īts (שֻׁמָתִי, shumāthī): One of the families of Kiriath-jearim (1 Ch 2 53).

SHUNAMMITE, shōō′na-mīt (שֻׁנַמִּית, shunammīth, שׁוּנַמִּית, shūnammīth; B, Σωμανεῖτις, Sōmaneítis, A, Σουμανιτῆς, Soumanitḗs): Applied to natives of Shunem.

(1) Abishag, who was brought to minister to the aged king David, love for whom led Adonijah to his doom (1 K 1 3.15; 2 17, etc).

(2) The woman, name unknown, whose son Elisha raised from the dead (2 K 4 12, etc). Later when apparently she had become a widow, after seven years' absence on account of famine, in the land of the Philis, she returned to find her property in the hands of others. Elisha's intervention secured its restoration (8 1–6).

(3) The Shulammite (Cant 6 13). In this name there is the exchange of l for n which is common.

SHUNEM, shōō′nem (שׁוּנֵם, shūnēm; B, Σουνάν, Sounán, A, Σουνάμ, Sounám): A town in the territory of Issachar named with Jezreel and Chesulloth (Josh 19 18). Before the battle of Gilboa the Philis pitched their camp here. They and the army of Saul, stationed on Gilboa, were in full view of each other (1 S 28 4). It was the scene of the touching story recorded in 2 K 4 8–37, in which the prophet Elisha raises to life the son of his Shunammite benefactress. Onom describes it as a village called Sulem, 5 Rom miles S. of Mt. Tabor. This points to the modern Sōlam, a village surrounded by cactus hedges and orchards on the lower southwestern slope of Jebel ed-Duḥy ("Hill of Moreh"). It commands an uninterrupted view across the plain of Esdraelon to Mt. Carmel, which is about 15 miles distant. It also looks far across the valley of Jezreel to the slopes of Gilboa on the S. It therefore meets satisfactorily the conditions of Josh and 1 S. A question has, however, been raised as to its identity with the Shunem of 2 K 4. Elisha's home was in Samaria. Apparently Carmel was one of his favorite haunts. If he passed Shunem "continually" (ver 9), going to and coming from the mountain, it involved a very long détour if this were the village visited. It would seem more natural to identify the Shunem of Elisha with the Sanim of Onom, which is said to be in the territory of Sebaste (Samaria), in the region of Akrabatta: or perhaps with Sālim, fully a mile N. of Taanach, as nearer the line of travel between Samaria and Carmel.

There is, however, nothing to show that Elisha's visits to Shunem were paid on his journeys between Samaria and Carmel. It may have been his custom to visit certain cities on circuit, on business calling for his personal attention, e.g. in connection with the "schools of the prophets." Materials do not exist on which any certain conclusion can rest. Both Sōlam and Sālim are on the edge of the splendid grain fields of Esdraelon (2 K 4 18).

SHUPHAM, shōō′fam, SHUPHAMITES, shōō′-fam-īts. See Shephupham.

SHUPPIM, shup′im (שֻׁפִּים, shuppīm):

(1) One of the descendants of Benjamin (1 Ch 7 12.15).

(2) One of the porters in the temple (1 Ch 26 16). See Muppim; Shephupham.

SHUR, shûr, shōōr (שׁוּר, shūr; Σούρ, Soúr): The name of a desert E. of the Gulf of Suez. The word means a "wall," and may probably refer to the mountain wall of the Tîh plateau as visible from the shore plains. In Gen 16 7 Hagar at Kadesh ('Ain Ḳadîs) (see ver 14) is said to have been "in the way to Shur." Abraham also lived "between Kadesh and Shur" (Gen 20 1). The position of Shur is defined (Gen 25 18) as being "opposite Egypt on the way to Assyria." After crossing the Red Sea (Ex 15 4) the Hebrews entered the desert of Shur (ver 22), which extended southward a distance of three days' journey. It is again noticed (1 S 15 7) as being opposite Egypt, and (27 8) as near Egypt. There is thus no doubt of its situation, on the E. of the Red Sea, and of the Bitter Lakes.

Brugsch, however, proposed to regard Shur ("the wall") as equivalent to the Egyp anbu ("wall"), the name of a fortification of some kind apparently near Ḳanṭarah (see Migdol [2]), probably barring the entrance to Egypt on the road from Pelusium to Zoan. The extent of this "wall" is unknown, but Brugsch connects it with the wall mentioned by Diodorus Siculus (i.4) who wrote about 8 BC, and who attributed it to Sesostris (probably Rameses II) who defended "the east side of Egypt against the irruptions of the Syrians and Arabians, by a wall drawn from Pelusium through the deserts as far as to Heliopolis, for a space of 1,500 furlongs." Heliopolis lies 90 miles (not 188) S.W. of Pelusium: this wall, if it existed at all, would have run on the edge of the desert which extends N. of Wâdy Tumeilât from Ḳanṭarah to Tell el-Kebîr; but this line, on the borders of Goshen, is evidently much too far W. to have any connection with the desert of Shur E. of the Gulf of Suez. See Budge, Hist. Egypt, 90; Brugsch, Egypt under the Pharaohs, abridged edition, 320.

SHUSHAN, shōō′shan (שׁוּשַׁן, shūshan; Σουσάν, Sousán, Σούσα, Soúsa): This city, the Šušu or Šušan of the Babylonians, and the native

1. Position, Etymology and Forms of Its Name

(Elamite) Šušun, is the modern Shush (Sus) in Southwestern Persia, a series of ruin-mounds on the banks of the river Kerkha. The ancient etymologies ("city of lilies" or "of horses") are probably worthless, as an etymology in the language of the place would rather be expected. Sayce therefore connects the name with šašša, meaning "former," and pointing to some such meaning as "the old" city. It is frequently mentioned in the Bab inscriptions of the 3d millennium BC, and is expressed by the characters for the goddess Ištar and for "cedar," implying that it was regarded as the place of the "divine grove" (see 5, below). In later days, the Assyrians substituted for the second character, that having the value of šeš, possibly indicating its pronunciation. Radau (Early Bab History, 236) identifies Shushan (Susa) with the Šâša of the Bab king Kuri-galzu (14th cent. BC, if the first of the name), who dedicates to the Bab goddess Ninlil an inscription of a certain Siatu, who had, at an earlier date, dedicated it to Ištar for the life of the Bab king Dungi (c 2500 BC).

The surface still covered with ruins is about 2,000 hectares (4,940 acres), though this is but a fraction compared with the ancient extent of the city, which is estimated to have been between 12,000 and 15,000 hectares (29,640–37,000 acres). Though considerable, the extent of Susa was small compared with Nineveh and Babylon.

2. The Ruins

The ruins are divided by the French explorers into four tracts: (1) The Citadel-mound (W.), of the Achaemenian period (5th cent. BC), c 1,476 by 820 ft., dominating the plain (height c 124 ft.). (2) The Royal City on the E. of the Citadel, composed of two parts: the Apadana (N.E.), and a nearly triangular tract extending to the E. and the S. This contains the remains of the palace of Darius and his successors, and occupies rather more than 123 acres. The palace proper and the throne-room were separated from the rest of the official buildings. (3) The City, occupied by artisans, merchants, etc. (4) The district on the right bank, similarly inhabited. This anciently extended into all the lower plain, between the Shaour and the Kerkha. Besides these, there were many isolated ruins, and the suburbs contained a number of villages and separate constructions.

3. The "Royal City," "The Citadel," and the Ruins Therein

Most of the constructions at Susa are of the Pers period. In the northern part of the Royal City lie the remains of the Apadana, the only great monument of which remains were found on the level. The principal portion consisted of a great hall of columns, known as the throne-room of Artaxerxes Mnemon. It replaced an earlier structure by Darius, which was destroyed by fire in the time of Artaxerxes I. The columns apparently had capitals of the style common in Persia—the foreparts of two bulls kneeling back to back. In the Citadel a palace built by Xerxes seems to have existed, the base of one of his columns having been found there. Bricks bearing the inscriptions of early Elamite kings, and the foundations of older walls, testify to the antiquity of the occupation of this part. According to the explorers, this was the portion of the city reserved for the temples.

4. The Monuments Discovered

The number of important antiquities found on the site is considerable. Among the finds may be mentioned the triumphal stele of Narâm-Sin, king of Agadé (3d–4th millennium BC); the statuettes of the Bab king Dungi (c 2360 BC); the reliefs and inscriptions of the Elamite king Ba(?)-ša-Šušinak (c 2340 BC); the obelisk inscribed with the laws of Ḫammurabi of Babylon; the bronze bas-relief of the Elamite king Sutruk-Naḫḫunte (c 1120 BC), who carried off from Babylonia the stelae of Narâm-Sin and Ḫammurabi above mentioned, together with numerous other Bab monuments; the stele of Adda-ḫamiti-In-Šušnak, of a much later date, together with numerous other objects of art and inscriptions—a most precious archaeological find.

5. Aššur-bani-âpli's Description of the City

Shushan passed through many serious crises, one of the severest being its capture and destruction by the armies of the Assyr king Aššur-bani-âpli about 640 BC. According to his account, the ziqqurat or temple-tower of Susa was built of enameled brick imitating lapis-lazuli, and was adorned with pinnacles of bright bronze. The god of the city was Šušinak, who dwelt in a secret place, and none ever saw the form of his divinity. Lagamaru (Laomer) and five other of the city's deities were adored only by kings, and their images, with those of 12 more (worshipped by the people), were carried off as spoil to Assyria. Winged bulls and genii adorned Susa's temples, and figures of wild bulls protected the entrances to their shrines. Other noteworthy things were the sacred groves into which no stranger was allowed to enter, and the burial-places of the Elamite kings. After recovering from the blow inflicted by the Assyrians, Shushan ultimately regained its old importance, and, as the summer residence of the Pers kings, became the home of Ahasuerus and Queen Esther (Neh 1 1; Est 1 2.5; 2 3; 3 15; 9 11 ff; Dnl 8 2; Ad Est 11 3).

"Sick" and "sickness" (including "disease," etc) are the tr^{s} of 6 Heb and 9 Gr words and occur 56 t in the OT and 57 t in the NT. The number of references in the latter is significant as showing how much the healing of the sick was characteristic of the Lord's ministry. The diseases specified are varied. Of infantile sickness there is an instance in Bath-sheba's child (2 S 12 15), whose disease is termed 'ānash, not improbably trismus nascentium, a common disease in Pal. Among adolescents there are recorded the unspecified sickness of Abijah (1 K 14 1), of the widow's son at Zarephath (1 K 17 17), the sunstroke of the Shunammite's son (2 K 4 19), the epileptic boy (Mt 17 15), Jaïrus' daughter (Mt 9 18), and the nobleman's son (Jn 4 46). At the other extreme of life Jacob's death was preceded by sickness (Gen 48 1). Sickness resulted from accident (Ahaziah, 2 K 1 2), wounds (Joram, 2 K 8 29), from the violence of passion (Amnon, 2 S 13 2), or mental emotion (Dnl 8 27); see also in this connection Cant 2 5; 5 8. Sickness the result of drunkenness is mentioned (Hos 7 5), and as a consequence of famine (Jer 14 18) or violence (Mic 6 13). Dāweh or periodic sickness is referred to (Lev 15 33; 20 18), and an extreme case is that of Lk 8 43.

In some examples the nature of the disease is specified, as Asa's disease in his feet (1 K 15 23), for which he sought the aid of physicians in vain (2 Ch 16 12). Hezekiah and Job suffered from sore boils, Jehoram from some severe dysenteric attack (2 Ch 21 19), as did Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Macc 9 5). Probably the sudden and fatal disease of Herod was similar, as in both cases there is reference to the presence of worms (cf Acts 12 23 and 2 Macc 9 9). The disease of Publius' father was also dysentery (Acts 28 8). Other diseases specified are paralysis (Mt 8 6; 9 2), and fever (Mt 8 14). Not improbably the sudden illness of the young Egyptian at Ziklag (1 S 30 11), and the illness of Ben-hadad which weakened him so that he could not resist the violence of Hazael, were also the common Pal fever (2 K 8 15) of whose symptoms and effects there is a graphic description in Ps 38. Unspecified fatal illnesses were those of Elisha (2 K 13 14), Lazarus (Jn 11 1), Tabitha (Acts 9 37). In the language of the Bible, leprosy is spoken of as a defilement to be cleansed, rather than as a disease to be cured.

The proverb concerning the sick quoted by the Lord at Capernaum (Mk 2 17) has come down to us in several forms in apocryphal and rabbinical writings (Bābhā' Ḳammā' 26 13; Ṣanhedhrīn 176), but is nowhere so terse as in the form in which He expresses it. The Lord performed His healing of the sick by His word or touch, and one of the most emphatic charges which He gave to His disciples when sending them out was to heal the sick. One of the methods used by them, the anointing with oil, is mentioned in Mk 6 13 and enjoined by James (5 15). In later times the anointing which was at first used as a remedial agent became a ceremonial in preparation for death, one of the seven sacraments of the Rom church (Aquinas, Summa Theologia suppl. ad P iii. 29).

The duty of visiting the sick is referred to in Ezk 34 4.16, and by the Lord in the description of the Judgment scene (Mt 25 36.43). It is inculcated in several of the rabbinical tracts. "He that visits the sick lengthens his life, he who refrains shortens it," says Rabbi Ishanan in N^{e}dhārīm 29. In Shulḥan 'Ārūkh, Yōreh Dē'āh there is a chapter devoted to this duty, which is regarded as incumbent on the Jew, even though the sick person be a Gentile (Giṭṭīn 61a*). The church's duty to the sick, so long neglected, has, within the last century, been recognized in the mission field, and has proved, in heathen lands, to be the most important of all pioneer agressive methods.

While we find that the apostles freely exercised their gifts of healing, it is noteworthy that we read of the sickness of two of St. Paul's companions, Epaphroditus (Phil 2 26) and Trophimus (2 Tim 4 20), for whose recovery he seems to have used no other means than prayer. See also Disease.

SICKLE, sik″l (חֶרְמֵשׁ, ḥermēsh [Dt 16 9; 23 25], מַגָּל, maggāl; cf Arab. minjal [Jer 50 16; Joel 3 13]; δρέπανον, drépanon [Mk 4 29; Rev 14 14–19]): Although the ancients pulled much of their grain by hand, we know that they also used sickles. The form of this instrument varied, as is evidenced by the Egyp sculptures. The earliest sickle was probably of wood, shaped like the modern scythe, although much smaller, with the cutting edge made of sharp flints set into the wood. Sickle flints were found at Tel el-Ḥesy. Crescent-shaped iron sickles were found in the same mound. In Pal and Syria the sickle varies in size. It is usually made wholly of iron or steel and shaped much like the instrument used in western lands. The smaller-sized sickles are used both for pruning and for reaping.

SICYON, sish′i-on (Σικυών, Sikuṓn, Συκυών, Sukuṓn, Συκιών, Sukiṓn): Mentioned in 1 Macc 15 23 in the list of countries and cities to which Lucius the Rom consul (probably Lucius Calpurnius Piso, 139 BC) wrote, asking them to be friendly to the Jews. The Jewish dispersion had already taken place, and Jews were living in most of the seaports and cities of Asia Minor, Greece and Egypt (cf Sib Or 3 271, c 140 BC, and Philo).

Sicyon was situated 18 miles W. of Corinth on the south side of the Gulf of Corinth. Its antiquity and ancient importance are seen by its coins still extant, dating from the 5th cent. Though not as important as Corinth in its sea trade, the burning of that city in 143 BC, and the favor shown to Sicyon by the Rom authorities in adding to its territory and assigning to it the direction of the Isthmian games, increased its wealth and influence for a time.

SIDDIM, sid′im, VALE OF (עֵמֶק הַשִּׂדִּים, ʽēmeḳ ha-siddīm; LXX ἡ φάραγξ [or κοιλὰς] ἡ ἁλυκή, hē pháragx [koilás] hē halukḗ): The place mentioned in Gen 14 3–8 as being the scene of encounter between Chedorlaomer and his allies with the kings of Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboiim and Zoar. In ver 3 it is identified with the Salt Sea, and in ver 10 it is said to have been full of slime pits ("bitumen").

According to the traditional view, the Vale of Siddim was at the southern end of the Dead Sea. But in recent years a number of eminent authorities have maintained that it was at the northern end of the Dead Sea, in the vicinity of Jericho. Their argument has mainly been drawn from incidental references in the scene (Gen 13 1–13) describing the parting of Lot and Abram, and again in the account of Moses' vision from Pisgah (Dt 34 3).

In the account of Abram and Lot, it is said that from Bethel they saw "all the Plain of the Jordan, that it was well watered everywhere, before Jeh destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah." The word here trd "plain" means "circle," and well describes the view which one has of the plain about Jericho from Bethel as he looks down the valley past Ai. But it seems to go beyond the text to assume that the Vale of Siddim was within that circle of vision, for it is said in Gen 13 12 simply that Lot dwelt "in the cities of the Plain, and moved his tent as far as Sodom." In the vision of Moses, likewise, we have a very general and condensed description, in which it is said that he was shown "the Plain of the valley of Jericho, the city of palm-trees, unto Zoar," which, as we learn from Gen 19 22, was not far from the Vale of Siddim. It is true that from the traditional site of Pisgah the south end of the Dead Sea could not be seen. But we are by no means sure that the traditional site of Pisgah is the true one, or that the import of this language should be restricted to the points which are actually within range of vision.

The tendency at the present time is to return to the traditional view that the Vale of Siddim was at the south end of the Dead Sea. This is supported by the fact that Jebel Usdum, the salt mountain at the southwest corner of the Dead Sea, still bears the name of Sodom, Usdum being simply another form of the word. A still stronger argument, however, is drawn from the general topographical and geological conditions. In the first place, Zoar, to which Lot is said to have fled, was not far away. The most natural site for it is near the mouth of the Wâdy Kerak, which comes down from Moab into the southern end of the Dead Sea (see Zoar); and this city was ever afterward spoken of as a Moabite city, which would not have been the case if it had been at the north end of the sea. It is notable in Josh 13 15–21, where the cities given to Reuben are enumerated, that, though the slopes of Pisgah are mentioned, Zoar is not mentioned.

In Gen 14, where the battle between Amraphel and his allies with Sodom and the other cities of the plain is described, the south end of the Dead Sea comes in logical order in the progress of their campaign, and special mention is made of the slime or bitumen pits which occurred in the valley, and evidently played an important part in the outcome of the battle.

At the south end of the Dead Sea there is an extensive circle or plain which is better supplied with water for irrigation than is the region about Jericho, and which, on the supposition of slight geological changes, may have been extremely fertile in ancient times; while there are many indications of such fertility in the ruins that have been described by travelers about the mouth of the Kerak and other localities nearby. The description, therefore, of the fertility of the region in the Vale of Siddim may well have applied to this region at the time of Lot's entrance into it.

There are very persistent traditions that great topographical changes took place around the south end of the Dead Sea in connection with the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, while the opinion has been universally prevalent among the earlier historical writers that the site of Sodom and Gomorrah is beneath the waters of the Dead Sea.

Geological investigations, so far from disproving these traditions, render them altogether possible and credible. There is a remarkable contrast between the depths of the north end of the Dead Sea and of the south end. Near the north end the depth descends to 1,300 ft., whereas for many miles out from the south end it is very shallow, so that at low water a ford exists, and is occasionally used, from the north end of the salt mountain across to el-Lisân.

The precipitous salt cliffs of Jebel Usdum which border the southwest corner of the Dead Sea would indicate that, in comparatively recent times, there had been abrupt subsidence of a good many feet in the bottom of the Dead Sea at that end.

Such subsidences of limited areas and in connection with earthquakes are by no means uncommon. In 1819 an area of 2,000 sq. miles about the delta of the Indus sank beneath the level of the sea, so that the tops of the houses were barely seen above the water. A smaller area in the delta of the Selenga River sank during the last century beneath the waters of Lake Baikal. Professor R. S. Tarr of Cornell University has recently described the effect of an earthquake on the shores of Alaska, in which there was a change of level of 47 ft.

More probably (see Arabah; Dead Sea) there has been a rise in the waters of the Dead Sea since Abraham's time, caused by the encroachment upon the original area of evaporation by the deltas which have been pushed into the main part of the depression by the Jordan, and various smaller streams descending from the highlands on either side. In consequence of these encroachments, the equilibrium between precipitation and evaporation could be maintained only by a rise in the water causing it to spread over the shallow shelf at the south end, thus covering a large part of the Vale of Siddim with the shoal water now found between el-Lisân and Jebel Usdum. George Frederick Wright

SIDE, sī'dē (Σίδη, Sidē): An ancient town of Pamphylia, occupying a triangular promontory on the coast. It was one of the towns to which a letter favorable to the Jews was sent by the Rom consul Lucius (1 Macc 15 23). The town seems to have been of considerable antiquity, for it had existed long before it fell into the possession of Alexander the Great, and for a time it was the metropolis of Pamphylia. Off the coast the fleet of Antiochus was defeated by the Rhodians. During the 1st cent. Side was noted as one of the chief ports of pirates who disposed of much of their booty there. The ruins of the city, which are now very extensive, bear the name Eski Adalia, but among them there are no occupied houses. The two harbors protected by a sea wall may still be traced, but they are now filled with sand. The wall on the land side of the city was provided with a gate which was protected with round towers; the walls themselves are of Gr-Rom type. Within the walls the more important of the remains are three theaters near the harbors, and streets with covered porticoes leading from the city gate to the harbors. Without the walls, the street leading to the city gate is lined with sarcophagi, and among the shrubbery of the neighboring fields are traces of many buildings and of an aqueduct. E. J. Banks SIDES, sīdz (יַרְכָה, yar^{e}khāh, "thigh," "flank"): RV substitutes "innermost parts" for AV "sides" in Jon 1 5; cf 1 S 24 3.

SIDON, sī'don (צִידֹן, çīdhōn): The eldest son of Canaan (Gen 10 15).

SIDON, sī'don (צִידוֹן, çīdhōn; Σιδών, Sidōn; AV Sidon and Zidon; RV SIDON only): One of the oldest Phoen cities, situated on a narrow plain between the range of Lebanon and the sea, in lat. 33° 34′ nearly. The plain is well watered and fertile, about 10 miles long, extending from a little N. of Sarepta to the Bostrenus (Nahr el-'Auly). The ancient city was situated near the northern end of the plain, surrounded with a strong wall. It possessed two harbors, the northern one about 500 yds. long by 200 wide, well protected by little islets and a breakwater, and a southern about 600 by 400 yds., surrounded on three sides by land, but open to the W., and thus exposed in bad weather. The date of the founding of the city is unknown, but we find it mentioned in the Am Tab in the 14th cent. BC, and in Gen 10 19 it is the chief city of the Canaanites, and Joshua (Josh 11 8) calls it Great S. It led all the Phoen cities in its early development of maritime affairs, its sailors being the first to launch out into the open sea out of sight of land and to sail by night, guiding themselves by the stars. They were the first to come into contact with the Greeks and we find the mention of them several times in Homer, while other Phoen towns are not noticed. S. became early distinguished for its manufactures and the skill of its artisans, such as beautiful metal-work in silver and bronze and textile fabrics embroidered and dyed with the famous purple dye which became known as Tyrian, but which was earlier produced at S. Notices of these choice articles are found in Homer, both in the Iliad and the Odyssey. S. had a monarchical form of government, as did all the Phoen towns, but it also held a sort of hegemony over those to the S. as far as the limit of Phoenicia. It likewise made one attempt to establish an inland colony at Laish or Dan, near the headwaters of the Jordan, but this ended in disaster (Jgs 18 7.27.28). The attempt was not renewed, but many colonies were established over-sea. Citium, in Cyprus, was one of the earliest.

1. Location and Distinction

2. Historical

(1) The independence of S. was lost when the kings of the XVIIIth and XIXth Dynasties of Egypt added Pal and Syria to their dominions (1580–1205 BC). The kings of S. were allowed to remain on the throne as long as they paid tribute, and perhaps still exercised authority over the towns that had before been subject to them. When the power of Egypt declined under Amenhotep IV (1375–1358), the king of S. seems to have thrown off the yoke, as appears from the Am Tab. Rib-addi of Gebal writes to the king of Egypt that Zimrida, king of S., had joined the enemy, but Zimrida himself claims, in the letters he wrote, to be loyal, declaring that the town belonging to him had been taken by the Khabiri (Tab. 147). S., with the other towns, eventually became independent of Egypt, and she retained the hegemony of the southern towns and perhaps added Dor, claimed by the Philis, to her dominion. This may have been the reason for the war that took place about the middle of the 12th cent. BC, in which the Philis took and plundered S., whose inhabitants fled to Tyre and gave the latter a great impetus. S., however, recovered from the disaster and became powerful again. The Book of Jgs claims that Israel was oppressed by S. (10 12), but it is probable S. stands here for Phoenicia in general, as being the chief town.

(2) S. submitted to the Assyr kings as did the Phoen cities generally, but revolted against Sennacherib and again under Esar-haddon. The latter destroyed a large part of the city and carried off most of the inhabitants, replacing them by captives from Babylon and Elam, and renamed it Ir-Esar-haddon ("City of Esar-haddon"). The settlers readily mingled with the Phoenicians, and S. rose to power again when Assyria fell, was besieged by Nebuchadnezzar at the time of his siege of Jerus and Tyre, and was taken, having lost about half of its inhabitants by plague. The fall of Babylon gave another short period of independence, but the Persians gained control without difficulty, and S. was prominent in the Pers period as the leading naval power among the Phoenicians who aided their suzerain in his attacks upon Greece. In 351 BC, S. rebelled under Tabnit II (Tennes), and called in the aid of Gr mercenaries to the number of 10,000; but Ochus, the Pers king, marched against him with a force of 300,000 infantry and 30,000 horse, which so frightened Tabnit that he betrayed the city to save his own life. But the citizens, learning of the treachery, first burned their fleet and then their houses, perishing with their wives and children rather than fall into the hands of Ochus, who butchered all whom he seized, Tabnit among them. It is said that 40,000 perished in the flames. A list of the kings of S. in the Pers period has been recovered from the inscriptions and the coins, but the dates of their reigns are not accurately known. The dynasty of the known kings begins with Esmunazar I, followed by Tabnit I, Amastoreth; Esmunazar II, Strato I (Bodastart), Tabnit II (Tennes) and Strato II. Inscriptions from the temple of Esmun recently discovered give the name of a Bodastart and a son Yatonmelik, but whether the first is one of the Stratos above mentioned or a third is uncertain; also whether the son ever reigned or not. As Bodastart calls himself the grandson of Esmun-azar, he is probably Strato I who reigned about 374–363 BC, and hence his grandfather, Esmunazar I, must have reigned in 400 BC or earlier. Strato II was on the throne when Alexander took possession of Phoenicia and made no resistance to him, and even aided him in the siege of Tyre, which shows that S. had recovered after the terrible disaster it suffered in the time of Ochus. It perhaps looked upon the advance of Alexander with content as its avenger. The destruction of Tyre increased the importance of S., and after the death of Alexander it became attached to the kingdom of the Ptolemies and remained so until the victory of Antiochus III over Scopas (198 BC), when it passed to the Seleucids and from them to the Romans, who granted it a degree of autonomy with native magistrates and a council, and it was allowed to coin money in bronze.

Coin of Sidon.

3. NT Mention

S. comes into view several times in the NT; first when Christ passed into the borders of Tyre and S. and healed the daughter of the Syrophoenician woman (Mk 7 24–30); also when Herod Agrippa I received a delegation from Tyre and S. at Caesarea (Acts 12 20), where it appears to have been outside his jurisdiction. St. Paul, on his way to Rome, was permitted to visit some friends at S. (Acts 27 3). See also Mt 11 21 f and Mk 3 8.

It was noted for its school of philosophy under Augustus and Tiberius, its inhabitants being largely Greek; and when Berytus was destroyed by an earthquake in 551, its great law school was removed to S. It was not of great importance during the Crusades, being far surpassed by Acre, and in modern times it is a small town of some 15,000.

LITERATURE

1. In Early Hebrew History

In early Heb history, siege operations are not described and can have been little known. Although the Israelites had acquired a certain degree of military discipline in the wilderness, when they entered Canaan they had no experience of the operations of a siege and were without the engines of war necessary for the purpose. Jericho, with its strongly fortified wall, was indeed formally invested—it "was straitly shut up because of the children of Israel: none went out, and none came in" (Josh 6 1)—but it fell into their hands without a siege. Other cities seem to have yielded after pitched battles, or to have been taken by assault. Many of the Canaanite fortresses, like Gezer (2 S 5 25; Josh 16 10), Taanach and Megiddo (Jgs 1 27), remained unreduced. Jerus was captured by the men of Judah (Jgs 1 8), but the fort of Jebus remained unconquered till the time of David (2 S 5 6).

2. In the Monarchy

In the days of the monarchy more is heard of siege operations. At the siege of Rabbath-Ammon Joab seems to have deprived the city of its water-supply and rendered it untenable (2 S 11 1; 12 27). At Abel of Beth-maacah siege operations are described in which Joab distinguished himself (2 S 20 15). David and Solomon, and, after the disruption of the kingdom, Rehoboam and Jeroboam built fortresses which ere long became the scene of siege operations. The war between Judah and Israel in the days of Nadab, Baasha, and Elah was, for the most part, a war of sieges. It was while besieging Gibbethon that Nadab, the son of Jeroboam, was slain by Baasha (1 K 15 27), and, 27 years after, while the army of Israel was still investing the same place, the soldiery chose their commander Omri to be king over Israel (1 K 16 16). From the Egyptians, the Syrians, the Assyrians, and the Chaldaeans, with whom they came into relations in later times as allies or as enemies, the people of the Southern and of the Northern Kingdoms learned much regarding the art, both of attack and of defence of fortified places.

3. Preliminaries to Siege

It was an instruction of the Deuteronomic Law that before a city was invested for a long siege, it should be summoned to capitulate (Dt 20 10; cf 2 S 20 18; 2 K 18 17 ff). If the offer of peace be declined, then the siege is to be proceeded with, and if the city be captured, all the male population is to be put to death, and the women and children reserved as a prey for the captors. To this humane reservation the cities of the Canaanites were to be an exception: their inhabitants were to be wholly exterminated (Dt 20 16–18).

The same law prescribed that there should be no unnecessary destruction of fruit trees in the prosecution of a long siege. Trees not yielding fruit for human sustenance might be cut down: "And thou shalt build bulwarks [māçōr, "siegeworks"] against the city that maketh war with thee, until it fall" (Dt 20 19.20). This instruction to have regard to the fruit trees around a hostile city seems to have been more honored in the breach than in the observance, even in Israel. When the allied kings of Israel, Judah, and Edom were invading Moab and had instruction to "smite every fortified city," the prophet Elisha bade them also "fell every good tree, and stop all fountains of water, and mar every good piece of land with stones" (2 K 3 19.25). When the assault of Jerus by the Chaldaeans was imminent, Jeh commanded the cutting down of the trees (Jer 6 6). In Arabian warfare, we are told, the destruction of the enemy's palm groves was a favorite exploit (Robertson Smith, OTJC^{2}, 369), and the Assyrians when they captured a city had no compunction in destroying its plantations (Inscription of Shalmaneser II on Black Obelisk).

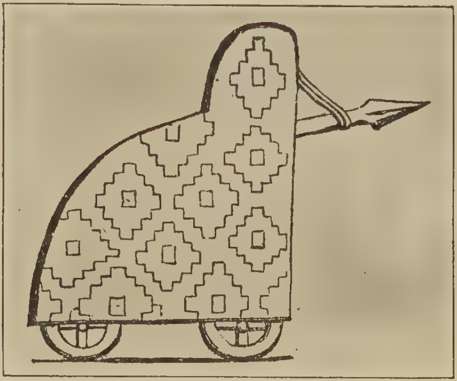
4. Siege Operations: Attack

From passages in the Prophets, upon which much light has been thrown by the ancient monuments of Assyria and Chaldaea, we gain a very clear idea of the siege works directed against a city by Assyr or Chaldaean invaders. The siege of Lachish (2 K 18 13.14; Isa 36 1.2) by Sennacherib is the subject of a series of magnificent reliefs from the mound of Koyunjik (Layard, Monuments of Nineveh, II, plates 20, 21, 22). The downfall of Nineveh as predicted in Nahum's prophecy lets us see the siege operations proceeding with striking realism (see Der Untergang Ninivehs by A. Jeremias and Colonel Billerbeck). Nowhere, however, are the incidents of a siege—the gathering of hostile forces, the slaughter of peaceful inhabitants in the country around, the raising of siege-works, the setting of engines of war against the walls, the demolition of the towers, the breach in the principal wall, the rush of men and the clatter of horses' hoofs through the streets, the slaughter, the pillage, the destruction of walls and houses—more fully and faithfully recorded than by Ezekiel when predicting the capture of Tyre by Nebuchadrezzar (Ezk 26 7–12). The siege of Tyre lasted 13 years, and Ezekiel tells how every head was made bald and every shoulder worn by the hard service of the besiegers (Ezk 29 18). There were various ways in which an invading army might deal with a fortified city so as to secure its possession. Terms might be offered to secure a capitulation (1 K 20 1 ff; 2 K 18 14 ff). An attempt might be made to reduce the city by starvation (2 K 6 24 ff; 2 K 17 5 ff). The city might be invested and captured by assault and storm, as Lachish was by Sennacherib (2 K 18 13; 19 8; see Layard, op cit., II, plates 20–24). The chief operations of the besiegers were as follows: (1) There was the investment of the city by the besieging army. It was sometimes necessary to establish a fortified camp, like that of Sennacherib at Lachish to guard against sorties by the defenders. Of the siege of Jerus we read that Nebuchadrezzar came, "he and all his army, against Jerus, and encamped against it" (Jer 52 4; cf 2 K 25 1). From the commencement of the siege, slingers and archers were posted where they could keep the defenders engaged; and it is to this that reference is made when Jeremiah says: "Call together the archers against Babylon, all them that bend the bow; encamp against her round about; let none thereof escape" (Jer 50 29).

(2) There was next the drawing of a line of circumvallation (dāyēḳ) with detached forts round about the walls. These forts were towers manned by archers, or they were used as stations from which to discharge missiles (Jer 52 4; Ezk 17 17). In this connection the word "munition" in AV and ERV (māçōr) in Nah 1 1 disappears in ARV and is replaced by "fortress."

(3) Following upon this was the mound (ṣōl^{e}lāh), or earthworks, built up to the height of the walls, so as to command the streets of the city, and strike terror into the besieged. From the mound thus erected the besiegers were able to batter the upper and weaker part of the city wall (2 S 20 15; Isa 37 33; Jer 6 6; Ezk 4 2; Dnl 11 15; Lam 4 18). If, however, the town, or fortress, was built upon an eminence, an inclined plane reaching to the height of the eminence might be formed of earth or stones, or trees, and the besiegers would be able to bring their engines to the foot of the walls. This road was even covered with bricks, forming a kind of paved way, up which the ponderous machines could be drawn without difficulty. To such roads there are references in Scripture (Job 19 12; Isa 29 3, "siege works"; cf Layard, Nineveh and Its Remains, II, 366 f). In the case of Tyre this mound, or way of approach, was a dam thrown across the narrow strait to obtain access to the walls (Ezk 26 8). Very often, too, there was a trench, sometimes filled with water, at the foot of the wall, which had to be dealt with previous to an assault.

(4) The earthworks having been thrown up, and approaches to the walls secured, it was possible to set and to work the battering-rams (kārīm) which were to be employed in breaching the walls (Ezk 4 2), or in bursting open the gates (Ezk 21 22). The battering-rams were of different kinds. On Assyr monuments they are found joined to movable towers holding warriors and armed men, or, in other cases, joined to a stationary tower constructed on the spot. When the men who are detailed to work the ram get it into play, with its heavy beams of planks fastened together and the great mass of metal forming its head, they can hardly fail to make an impression, and gradually, by the constantly repeated shocks, a breach is opened and the besiegers are able to rush in and bear down the defenders. It is to the shelter furnished by these towers that the prophet Nahum refers (2 5) when he says, "The mantelet is prepared," and that Isaiah points when he declares that the king of Assyria "shall not come unto this city, nor shoot an arrow there, neither shall he come before it with shield [māghēn], nor cast up a mound against it" (Isa 37 33). Ezekiel has the same figure when, describing the siege of Tyre by Nebuchadrezzar, he declares that he shall "cast up a mound" against her, and "raise up the buckler," the buckler (çinnāh) being like the Rom testudo, or roof of shields, under cover of which the besiegers carried on operations (Ezk 26 8; Colonel Billerbeck [op. cit., 178] is doubtful whether this device was known to the Assyrians). Under the shelter of their movable towers the besiegers could push forward mines, an operation known as part of siegecraft from a high antiquity (see 2 S 20 15, where ARVm and ERVm give "undermined" as an alternative to "battered"; tunneling was well known in antiquity, as the Siloam tunnel shows).



Battering-Ram.

(5) The culminating operation would be the storming of the walls, the rushing of the breach. Scaling-ladders were employed to cross the encircling trench or ditch (Prov 21 22); and Joel in his powerful description of the army of locusts which had devastated the land says that they "climb the wall like men of war" (Joel 2 7). Attempts were made to set fire to the gates and to break them open with axes (Jgs 9 52; cf Neh 1 3; 2 3; Ezk 26 9). Jeremiah tells of the breach that was made in the city when Jerus was captured (Jer 39 2). The breaches in the wall of Samaria are referred to by Amos (4 3), who pictures the women rushing forth headlong like a herd of kine with hooks and fishhooks in their nostrils.

5. Siege Operations: Defence

While the besiegers employed this variety of means of attack, the besieged were equally ingenious and active in maintaining the defence. All sorts of obstructions were placed in the way of the besieging army. Springs and cisterns likely to afford supplies of water to the invaders were carefully covered up, or drained off into the city. Where possible, trenches were filled with water to make them impassable. As the siege-works of the enemy approached the main wall, it was usual to build inner fortifications, and for this purpose houses were pulled down to provide the needful space and also to supply building materials (Isa 22 10). Slingers placed upon the walls hurled stones upon the advancing enemy, and archers from loopholes and protected battlements discharged arrows against the warriors in their movable towers. Sorties were made to damage the siege-works of the enemy and to prevent the battering-rams from being placed in position. To counteract the assaults of the battering-rams, sacks of chaff were let down like a ship's fender in front of the place where the engine operated—a contrivance countered again by poles with scythes upon them which cut off the sacks (Jos, BJ, III, vii, 20). So, too, the defenders, by dropping a doubled chain or rope from the battlements, caught the ram and broke the force of its blows. Attempts were made to destroy the ram also by fire. In the great bas-relief of the siege of Lachish an inhabitant is seen hurling a lighted torch from the wall; and it was a common device to pour boiling water or oil from the wall upon the assailants. Missiles, too, were thrown with deadly effect from the battlements by the defenders, and it was by a piece of a millstone thrown by a woman that Abimelech met his death at Thebez (Jgs 9 53). While Uzziah of Judah furnished his soldiers with shields and spears and helmets and coats of mail and bows and slingstones, he also "made in Jerus engines, invented by skilful men, to be on the towers and upon the battlements, wherewith to shoot arrows and great stones" (2 Ch 26 15). The Jews had, for the defence of Jerus against the army of Titus, engines which they had taken from the Twelfth Legion at Beth-horon which seem to have had a range of 1,200 ft. Many ingenious devices are described by Jos as employed by himself when conducting the defence of Jotapata in Galilee against Vespasian and the forces of Rome (BJ, III, vii).

6. Raising of the Siege

When Nahash king of the Ammonites laid siege to Jabesh-gilead in the opening days of the reign of Saul, the terms of peace offered to the inhabitants were so humiliating and cruel that they sought a respite of seven days and appealed to Saul in their distress. When the newly chosen king heard of their desperate condition he assembled a great army, scattered the Ammonites, and raised the siege of Jabesh-gilead, thus earning the lasting gratitude of the inhabitants (1 S 11; cf 1 S 31 12.13). When Zedekiah of Judah found himself besieged in Jerus by the Chaldaean army under Nebuzaradan, he sent intelligence to Pharaoh Hophra who crossed the frontier with his army to attack the Chaldaeans and obliged them to desist from the siege. The Chaldaeans withdrew for the moment from the walls of Jerus and offered battle to Pharaoh Hophra and his host, but the courage of the Egyp king failed him and he retired in haste without encountering the Chaldaeans in a pitched battle. The siege was prosecuted to the bitter end, and Jerus was captured and completely overthrown (2 K 25 1; Jer 37 3–10; Ezk 17 17).

7. Horrors of Siege and Capture

In the ancient law of Israel "siege" is classed with drought and pestilence and exile as punishments with which Jeh would visit His people for their disobedience (Dt 28 49–57). Of the horrors there described they had again and again bitter experience. At the siege of Samaria by Ben-hadad II, so terrible were the straits to which the besieged were reduced that they cooked and ate their own children (2 K 6 28). In the siege of Jerus by the Chaldaeans, which ended in the overthrow of the city and the destruction of the Temple, the sufferings of the inhabitants from hunger and disease were incredible (2 K 25 3; Jer 32 24; Lam 2 20; 4 8–10). The horrors of siege have, perhaps, reached their climax in the account given by Jos of the tragedy of Masada. To escape capture by the Romans, ten men were chosen by lot from among the occupants of the fortress, 960 in number, including combatants and non-combatants, men, women and children, to slay the rest. From these ten one was similarly chosen to slay the survivors, and he, having accomplished his awful task, ran his sword into his own body (Jos, BJ, VII, ix, 1). While all the inhabitants of a city under siege suffered the famine of bread and the thirst for water, the combatants ran the risk of impalement and other forms of torture to which prisoners in Assyr and Chaldaean and Rom warfare were subjected.

Rock of Masada.

The horrors attending the siege of a city were only surpassed by the barbarities perpetrated at its capture. The emptying of a city by its capture is likened to the hurling of a stone from a sling (Jer 10 17.18). Deportation of the whole of the inhabitants often followed (2 K 17 6; 24 14). Not only were the inhabitants of the captured city deported, but their gods were carried off with them and the idols broken in pieces. This is predicted or recorded of Babylon (Isa 21 9; 46 1; Jer 50 2), of Egypt (Jer 43 12), of Samaria (Hos 10 6). Indiscriminate slaughter followed the entrance of the assailants, and the city was usually given over to the flames (Jer 39 8.9; Lam 4 18). "Cities without number," says Shalmaneser II in one of his inscriptions, "I wrecked, razed, burned with fire." Houses were destroyed and women dishonored (Zec 14 2). When Darius took Babylon, he impaled three thousand prisoners (Herod. iii.159). The Scythians scalped and flayed their enemies and used their skins for horse trappings (ib, iv.64). The Assyr sculptures show prisoners subjected to horrible tortures, or carried away into slavery. The captured Zedekiah had his eyes put out after he had seen his own sons cruelly put to death (2 K 25 7). It is only employing the imagery familiar to Assyr warfare when Isaiah represents Jeh as saying to Sennacherib: "Therefore will I put my hook in thy nose, and my bridle in thy lips, and I will turn thee back by the way by which thou camest" (Isa 37 29). Anticipating the savage barbarities that would follow the capture of Samaria by the Assyrians, Hosea foresees the infants being dashed to pieces and the women with child being ripped up (Hos 10 14; 13 16; cf Am 1 13). The prophet Nahum predicting the overthrow of Nineveh recalls how at the capture of No-amon (Egyp Thebes) by the Assyr conqueror, Ashurbanipal, "her young children also were dashed in pieces at the head of all the streets; and they cast lots for her honorable men, and all her great men were bound in chains" (Nah 3 10).

8. Siege in the NT

The only explicit reference to siege operations in the NT is Our Lord's prediction of the complete destruction of Jerus when He wept over its coming doom: "For the days shall come upon thee, when thine enemies shall cast up a bank [χάραξ, chárax, AV, quite incorrectly, "trench"] about thee, and compass thee round, and keep thee in on every side, and shall dash thee to the ground, and thy children within thee; and they shall not leave in thee one stone upon another" (Lk 19 43.44). The order and particulars of the siege are in accordance with the accounts of siege operations in the OT. How completely the prediction was fulfilled we see from Jos (BJ, V, vi, 10).

Figurative: In St. Paul's Epp. there are figures taken from siege operations. In 2 Cor 10 4 we have "the casting down of strongholds," where the Gr word καθαίρεσις, kathaíresis, from καθαιρεῖν, kathaireín, is the regular word used in LXX for the reduction of a fortress (Prov 21 22; Lam 2 2; 1 Macc 5 65). In Eph 6 16 there is allusion to siege-works, for the subtle temptations of Satan are set forth as the flaming darts hurled by the besiegers of a fortress which the Christian soldier is to quench with the shield of faith.

SIGLOS, sig'los (σίγλος, síglos): A Pers silver coin, twenty of which went to the gold Daric (q.v.).

SIGN, sīn (אוֹת, 'ōth, "a sign," "mark," מוֹפֵת, mōphēth, "wonder"; σημεῖον, sēmeíon, "a sign," "signal," "mark"): A mark by which persons or things are distinguished and made known. In Scripture used generally of an address to the senses to attest the existence of supersensible and therefore Divine power. Thus the plagues of Egypt were "signs" of Divine displeasure against the Egyptians (Ex 4 8 ff; Josh 24 17, and often); and the miracles of Jesus were "signs" to attest His unique relationship with God (Mt 12 38; Jn 2 18; Acts 2 22). Naturally, therefore, both in the OT and the NT, "signs" are assimilated to the miraculous, and prevailingly associated with immediate Divine interference. The popular belief in this manner of communication between the visible and the invisible worlds has always been, and is now, widespread. So-called "natural" explanations, however ingenious or cogent, fail with the great majority of people to explain anything. Wesley and Spurgeon were as firm believers in the validity of such methods of intercourse between man and God as were Moses and Gideon, Peter and John.

The faith that walks by signs is not by any means to be lightly esteemed. It has been allied with the highest nobility of character and with the most signal achievement. Moses accepted the leadership of his people in response to a succession of signs: e.g. the burning bush, the rod which became a serpent, the leprous hand, etc (Ex 3 and 4); so, too, did Gideon, who was not above making proof of God in the sign of the fleece of wool (Jgs 6 36–40). In the training of the Twelve, Jesus did not disdain the use of signs (Lk 5 1–11, and often); and the visions by which Peter and Paul were led to the evangelization of the Gentiles were interpreted by them as signs of the Divine purpose (Acts 10 and 16).

The sacramental use of the sign dates from the earliest period, and the character of the sign is as diverse as the occasion. The rainbow furnishes radiant suggestion of God's overarching love and assurance that the waters shall no more become a flood to destroy the earth (Gen 9 13; cf 4 15); the Feast of Unleavened Bread is a reminder of God's care in bringing His people out of bondage (Ex 13 3); the Sabbath is an oft-recurring proclamation of God's gracious thought for the well-being of man (Ex 31 13; Ezk 20 12); the brazen serpent, an early foreshadowing of the cross, perpetuates the imperishable promise of forgiveness and redemption (Nu 21 9); circumcision is made the seal of the special covenant under which Israel became a people set apart (Gen 17 11); baptism, the Christian equivalent of circumcision, becomes the sign and seal of the dedicated life and the mark of those avowedly seeking to share in the blessedness of the Kingdom of God (Lk 3 12–14; Acts 2 41, and often); bread and wine, a symbol of the spiritual manna by which soul and body are preserved unto everlasting life, is the hallowed memorial of the Lord's death until His coming again (Lk 22 14–20; 1 Cor 11 23–28). Most common of all were the local altars and mounds consecrated in simple and sincere fashion to a belief in God's ruling and overruling providence (Josh 4 1–10).

Signs were offered in proof of the Divine commission of prophet (Isa 20 3) and apostle (2 Cor 12 12), and of the Messiah Himself (Jn 20 30; Acts 2 22); and they were submitted in demonstration of the Divine character of their message (2 K 20 9; Isa 38 1; Acts 3 1–16). By anticipation the child to be born of a young woman (Isa 7 10–16; cf Lk 2 12) is to certify the prophet's pledge of a deliverer for a captive people. See Immanuel.

With increase of faith the necessity for signs will gradually decrease. Jesus hints at this (Jn 4 48), as does also Paul (1 Cor 1 22). Nevertheless "signs," in the sense of displays of miraculous powers, are to accompany the faith of believers (Mk 16 17 f), usher in and forthwith characterize the dispensation of the Holy Spirit, and mark the consummation of the ages (Rev 15 1). See also Miracle.

SIHON, sī′hon (סִיחוֹן, ṣīḥōn): King of the Amorites, who vainly opposed Israel on their journey from Egypt to Pal, and who is frequently mentioned in the historical books and in the Pss because of his prominence and as a warning for those who rise against Jeh and His people (Nu 21 21, and often; Dt 1 4; 31 4; Josh 2 10; Jgs 11 19. 20.21; 1 K 4 19; Neh 9 22; Ps 135 11; 136 19; Jer 48 45).

SILAS, sī′las (Σίλας, Sílas, probably contraction for Σιλουανός, Silouanós; the Heb equivalents suggested are שְׁלִישׁ, shālīsh, "Tertius," or שֶׁלַח, shelaḥ [Gen 10 24] [Knowling], or שָׁאוּל, shā'ūl= "asked" [Zahn]): The Silas of Acts is generally identified with the Silvanus of the Epp. His identification with Titus has also been suggested, based on 2 Cor 1 19; 8 23, but this is very improbable (cf Knowling, Expositor's Gr Test., II, 326). Silas, who was probably a Rom citizen (cf Acts 16 37), accompanied Paul during the greater part of his 2d missionary journey (Acts 15–18). At the meeting of the Christian community under James at Jerus, which decided that circumcision should not be obligatory in the case of gentile believers, Silas and Judas Barsabas were appointed along with Paul and Barnabas to convey to the churches in Antioch and Syria and Cilicia the ep. informing them of this decision. As "leading men among the brethren" at Jerus, and therefore more officially representative of the Jerus church than Paul and Barnabas, Silas and Judas were further commissioned to confirm the contents of the letter by "word of mouth." On arrival at Antioch, the ep. was delivered, and Judas and Silas, "being themselves also prophets, exhorted the brethren with many words, and confirmed them." Their mission being thus completed, the four were "dismissed in peace from the brethren unto those that had sent them forth" (RV), or "unto the apostles" (AV) (Acts 15 22–33).

Different readings now render the immediate movements of Silas somewhat obscure; ver 33 would imply that he returned to Jerus. But some texts proceed in ver 34, "Notwithstanding it pleased Silas to abide there still," and others add "and Judas alone proceeded." Of this, the first half is accepted by AV. The principal texts however reject the whole verse and are followed in this by RV. It is held by some that he remained in Antioch till chosen by Paul (ver 40). Others maintain that he returned to Jerus where John Mark then was (cf Acts 13 13); and that either during the interval of "some days" (Acts 15 36), when the events described in Gal 2 11 ff took place (Wendt), he returned to Antioch along with Peter, or that he and John Mark were summoned thither by Paul and Barnabas, subsequent to their dispute regarding Mark. (For fuller discussion, see Knowling, Expositor's Gr Test., II, 330, 332–35.)

Upon Barnabas' separation from Paul, Silas was chosen by Paul in his place, and the two missionaries, "after being commended by the brethren [at Antioch] to the grace of the Lord," proceeded on their journey (Acts 15 33 m–40). Passing through Syria, Cilicia, Galatia, Phrygia and Mysia, where they delivered the decree of the Jerus council and strengthened the churches, and were joined by Timothy, they eventually reached Troas (Acts 15 41—16 8). Indications are given that at this city Luke also became one of their party (cf also the apocryphal "Acts of St. Paul," where this is definitely stated; Budge, Contendings of the Apostles, II, 544).

Upon the call of the Macedonian, the missionary band set sail for Greece, and after touching at Samothrace, they landed at Neapolis (Acts 16 9–11). At Philippi, Lydia, a seller of purple, was converted, and with her they made their abode; but the exorcism of an evil spirit from a sorceress brought upon Silas and Paul the enmity of her masters, whose source of gain was thus destroyed. On being charged before the magistrates with causing a breach of the peace and preaching false doctrine, their garments were rent off them and they were scourged and imprisoned. In no way dismayed, they prayed and sang hymns to God, and an earthquake in the middle of the night secured them a miraculous release. The magistrates, on learning that the two prisoners whom they had so maltreated were Rom citizens, came in person and besought them to depart out of the city (Acts 16 12–39). After a short visit to the house of Lydia, where they held an interview with the brethren, they departed for Thessalonica, leaving Luke behind (cf Knowling, op. cit., 354–55). There they made many converts, esp. among the Greeks, but upon the house of Jason, their host, being attacked by hostile Jews, they were compelled to escape by night to Berœa (16 40—17 10). There they received a better hearing from the Jews, but the enmity of the Thessalonian Jews still pursued them, and Paul was conducted for safety to Athens, Silas and Timothy being left behind. On his arrival, he dispatched an urgent message back to Berœa for Silas and Timothy to rejoin him at that city (17 11–15). The narrative of Acts implies, however, that Paul had left Athens and had reached Corinth before he was overtaken by his two followers (18 5). Knowling (op. cit., 363–64) suggests that they may have actually met at Athens, and that Timothy was then sent to Thessalonica (cf 1 Thess 3 1.2), and Silas to Philippi (cf Phil 4 15), and that the three came together again at Corinth. The arrival of Silas and Timothy at that city is probably referred to in 2 Cor 11 9. It is implied in Acts 18 18 that Silas did not leave Corinth at the same time as Paul, but no further definite reference is made to him in the narrative of the 2d missionary journey.

Assuming his identity with Silvanus, he is mentioned along with Paul and Timothy in 2 Cor 1 19 as having preached Christ among the Corinthians (cf Acts 18 5). In 1 Thess 1 1, and 2 Thess 1 1, the same three send greetings to the church at Thessalonica (cf Acts 17 1–9). In 1 Pet 5 12 he is mentioned as a "faithful brother" and the bearer of that letter to the churches of the Dispersion (cf on this last Knowling, op. cit., 331–32). The theory which assigns He to the authorship of Silas is untenable.

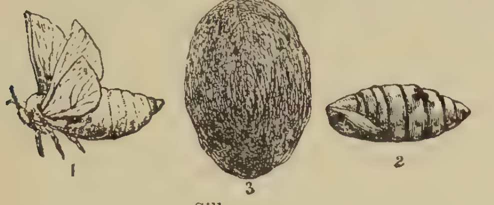
SILENCE, sī′lens: Five Heb roots, with various derivatives, and two Gr words are thus trd. The word is used lit. for dumbness, interrupted speech, as in Lam 2 10; Ps 32 3; Eccl 3 7; Am 5 13; Acts 15 12; 1 Cor 14 28; 1 Tim 2 11.12 AV (ARV "quietness"); Rev 8 1, or figuratively of the unanswered prayers of the believer (Ps 83 1; 35 22; Jer 8 14); of awe in the presence of the Divine majesty (Isa 41 1; Zec 2 13), or of death (1 S 2 9; Ps 94 17; 115 17).

SILK, SILKWORM, silk′wûrm ([1] מֶשִׁי, meshī [Ezk 16 10.13], perhaps from √ מָשָׁה, māshāh, "to draw," "to extract"; cf Arab. مَسَى, masa', of same meaning; LXX τρίχαπτον, tríchapton, "woven of hair"; [2] σήρικον, sêrikon [Rev 18 12]; [3] שֵׁשׁ, shēsh; cf Arab. شَاش, shâsh, a thin cotton material; [4] בּוּץ, būç; cf Arab. أَبْيَض, 'abyaḍ, "white," from √ بَاض, bâḍ; [5] βύσσος, bússos, "fine linen," later used of cotton and silk): The only undoubted reference to silk in the Bible is the passage cited from Rev, where it is mentioned among the merchandise of Babylon. Sērikon, "silk," is from Sēr, the Gr name of China, whence silk was first obtained. The equivalent Lat sericum occurs frequently in classical authors, and is found in the Vulg (Est 8 15) for būç, "fine linen." For būç, bussos, and shēsh EV has nearly always "fine linen," but for shēsh in Prov 31 22, AV has "silk," and in Gen 41 42 and Ex 25 4, AVm has "silk" and RVm has "cotton." See Linen; Fine.



Silkworm.
1. Moth. 2. Chrysalis. 3. Cocoon.

There can be little doubt of the correctness of EV "silk" for meshī in Ezk 16 10, "I girded thee about with fine linen [shēsh], and covered thee with silk [meshī]," and in the similar passage, Ezk 16 13.

Silk is produced by all Lepidoptera, butterflies and moths, but it is of great economic importance only in the Chinese silkworm, Bombyx mori, whose larva, a yellowish-white caterpillar from 2 to 3 in. long, feeds on the leaves of the mulberry (Morus). A pair of large glands on the two sides of the stomach secrete a viscous fluid, which is conveyed by ducts to an orifice under the mouth. On issuing into the air, the fine stream is hardened into the silk fiber, which the caterpillar spins into a cocoon. Within the cocoon the caterpillar is presently transformed into the chrysalis or pupa. The cocoons from which silk is to be spun are subjected to heat which kills the pupae and prevents them from being transformed into the perfect insects or moths, which would otherwise damage the cocoons as they made their exit.

The raising of silkworms, and the spinning and weaving of silk are now important industries in Syria, though the insect was unknown in Bible times. It was introduced to the Mediterranean region from China a few centuries after Christ. Coarse silk is produced from the Chinese oak silk-moth, Saturnia pernyi, and from the Japanese oak silk-moth, Saturnia yama-mai. The largest moth of Syria and Pal is Saturnia pyri, from which silk has also been spun, but not commercially. See, further, Weaving.

SILLA, sil′a (סִלָּא, ṣillā'; B, Γαλλά, Gallá, A, Γααλλάδ, Gaallád): Joash was assassinated by his servants "at the house of Millo, on the way that goeth down to Silla" (2 K 12 20). Wherever Beth-millo stood, Silla was evidently in the valley below it; but nothing is known of what it was or where it stood.

SILOAM, si-lō′am, sī-lō′am, SILOAH, si-lō′a, SHELAH, shē′la, SHILOAH, shi-lō′a: (1) מֵי הַשִּׁלֹחַ, mē ha-shilō^{a}ḥ (shilō^{a}ḥ or shillō^{a}ḥ is a passive form and means "sent" or "conducted"), "the waters of [the] Shiloah" (Isa 8 6). (2) בְּרֵכַת הַשֶּׁלַח, b^{e}rēkhath ha-shelaḥ, "the pool of [the] Shelah" (AV "Siloah") (Neh 3 15). (3) τὴν κολυμβήθραν τοῦ (or τὸν) Σιλωάμ, tḗn kolumbḗthran toú (tón) Silōám, "the pool of Siloam" (Jn 9 7). (4) ὁ πύργος ἐν τῷ Σιλωάμ, ho púrgos en tō̂ Silōám, "the tower in Siloam" (Lk 13 4).

1. The Modern Silwān

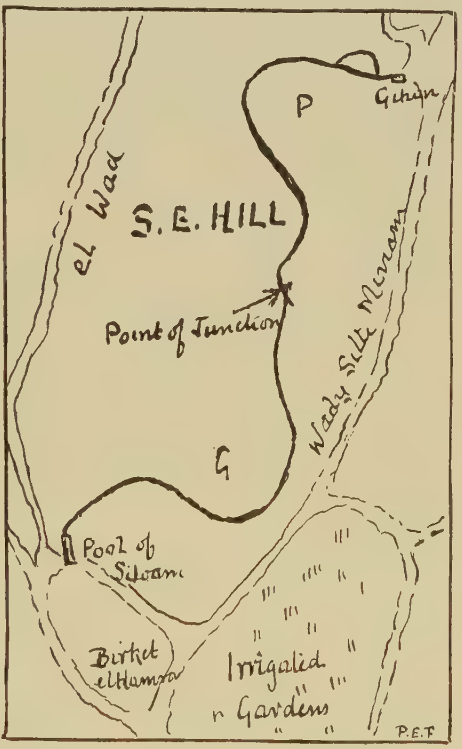
Although the name is chiefly used in the OT and Jos as the name of certain "waters," the surviving name today, Silwān, is that of a fairly prosperous village which extends along the steep east side of the Kidron valley from a little N. of the "Virgin's Fountain" as far as Bīr Eyyūb. The greater part of the village, the older and better built section, belongs to Moslem fellahin who cultivate the well-watered gardens in the valley and on the hill slopes opposite, but a southern part has recently been built in an extremely primitive manner by Yemen Jews, immigrants from South Arabia, and still farther S., in the commencement of the Wâdy en Nâr, is the wretched settlement of the lepers. How long the site of Silwān has been occupied it is impossible to say. The village is mentioned in the 10th cent. by the Arab writer Muḳaddasi. The numerous rock cuttings, steps, houses, caves, etc, some of which have at times served as chapels, show that the site has been much inhabited in the past, and at one period at least by hermits. The mention of "those eighteen, upon whom the tower in Siloam fell, and killed them" (Lk 13 4) certainly suggests that there was a settlement there in NT times, although some writers consider that this may have reference to some tower on the city walls near the Pool of Siloam.

2. The Siloam Aqueduct

Opposite to the main part of Silwān is the "Virgin's Fount," ancient Gihon (q.v.), whose waters are practically monopolized by the villagers. It is the waters of this spring which are referred to in Isa 8 5.6: "Forasmuch as this people have refused the waters of Shiloah that go softly, ... now therefore, behold, the Lord bringeth up upon them the waters of the River."



Serpentine Course of Siloam Aqueduct.

The contrast between the little stream flowing from the Gihon and the great Euphrates is used as a figure of the vast difference between the apparent strength of the little kingdom of Judah and the House of David on the one hand, and the might of "Rezin and Remaliah's son" and "all his glory." Although it is quite probable that in those days there was an open streamlet in the valley, yet the meaning of Shiloah, "sent" or "conducted," rather implies some kind of artificial channel, and there is also archaeological evidence that some at least of the waters of Gihon were even at that time conducted by a rock-cut aqueduct along the side of the Kidron valley (see JERUSALEM, VII, 5). It was not, however, till the days of Hezekiah that the great tunnel aqueduct, Siloam's most famous work, was made (2 K 20 20): "Hezekiah also stopped the upper spring of the waters of Gihon, and brought them straight down on the west side of the City of David" (2 Ch 32 30); "They stopped all the fountains, and the brook [naḥal] that flowed through the midst of the land, saying, Why should the kings of Assyria come, and find much water?" (2 Ch 32 4; Ecclus 48 17). Probably the exit of the water at Gihon was entirely covered up and the water flowed through the 1,700 ft. of tunnel and merged in the pool made for it (now known as the Birket Silwān) near the mouth of the Tyropœon valley. This extraordinary winding aqueduct along which the waters of the "Virgin's Fount" still flow is described in JERUSALEM, VII, 4 (q.v.). The lower end of this tunnel which now emerges under a modern arch has long been known as 'Ain Silwān, the "Fountain of Siloam," and indeed, until the rediscovery of the tunnel connecting this with the Virgin's Fount (a fact known to some in the 13th cent., but by no means generally known until the last century), it was thought this was simply a spring. So many springs all over Pal issue from artificial tunnels—it is indeed the rule in Judaea—that the mistake is natural. Jos gives no hint that he knew of so great a work as this of Hezekiah's, and in the 5th cent. a church was erected, probably by the empress Eudoxia, at this spot, with the high altar over the sacred "spring." The only pilgrim who mentions this church is Antonius Martyr (c 570), and after its destruction, probably by the Persians in 614, it was entirely lost sight of until excavated by Messrs. Bliss and Dickie. It is a church of extraordinary architectural features; the floor of the center aisle is still visible.

3. The "Pool of Siloam"

The water from the Siloam aqueduct, emerging at 'Ain Silwān, flows today into a narrow shallow pool, approached by a steep flight of modern steps; from the southern extremity of this pool the water crosses under the modern road by means of an aqueduct, and after traversing a deeply cut rock channel below the scarped cliffs on the north side of el-Wâd, it crosses under the main road up the Kidron and enters a number of channels of irrigation distributed among the gardens of the people of Silwān. The water here, as at its origin, is brackish and impregnated with sewage.

The modern Birket es-Silwān is but a poor survivor of the fine pool which once was here. Bliss showed by his excavations at the site that once there was a great rock-cut pool, 71 ft. N. and S., by 75 ft. E. and W., which may, in part at least, have been the work of Hezekiah (2 K 20 20), approached by a splendid flight of steps along its west side. The pool was surrounded by an arcade 12 ft. wide and 22½ ft. high, and was divided by a central arcade, to make in all probability a pool for men and another for women. These buildings were probably Herodian, if not earlier, and therefore this, we may reasonably picture, was the condition of the pool at the time of the incident in Jn 9 7, when Jesus sent the blind man to "wash in the pool of Siloam."

This pool is also probably the Pool of Shelah described in Neh 3 15 as lying between the Fountain Gate and the King's Garden. It may also be the "king's pool" of Neh 2 14. If we were in any doubt regarding the position of the pool of Siloam, the explicit statement of Jos (BJ, V, iv, 1) that the fountain of Siloam, which he says was a plentiful spring of sweet water, was at the mouth of the Tyropœon would make us sure.

4. The Birket el Ḥamra

A little below this pool, at the very mouth of el-Wâd, is a dry pool, now a vegetable garden, known as Birket el Ḥamra ("the red pool"). For many years the sewage of Jerus found its way to this spot, but when in 1904 an ancient city sewer was rediscovered (see PEFS, 1904, 392–94), the sewage was diverted and the site was sold to the Gr convent which surrounded it with a wall. Although this is no longer a pool, there is no doubt but that hereabouts there existed a pool because the great and massive dam which Bliss excavated here (see JERUSALEM, VI, 5) had clearly been made originally to support a large body of water. It is commonly supposed that the original pool here was older than the Birket Silwān, having been fed by an aqueduct which was constructed from Gihon along the side of the Kidron valley before Hezekiah's great tunnel. If this is correct (and excavations are needed here to confirm this theory), then this may be the "lower pool" referred to in Isa 22 9, the waters of which Hezekiah "stopped," and perhaps, too, that described in the same passage as the "old pool."

5. The Siloam Aqueduct

The earliest known Heb inscription of any length was accidentally discovered near the lower end of the Siloam aqueduct in 1880, and reported by Dr. Schick. It was inscribed upon a rock-smoothed surface about 27 in. square, some 15 ft. from the mouth of the aqueduct; it was about 3 ft. above the bottom of the channel on the east side. The inscription consisted of six lines in archaic Heb, and has been tr^{d} by Professor Sayce as follows:

(1) Behold the excavation. Now this [is] the history of the tunnel: while the excavators were still lifting up

(2) The pick toward each other, and while there were yet three cubits [to be broken through] . . . . the voice of the one called

(3) To his neighbor, for there was an [?] excess in the rock on the right. They rose up . . . . they struck on the west of the

(4) Excavation; the excavators struck, each to meet the other, pick to pick. And there flowed

(5) The waters from their outlet to the pool for a thousand, two hundred cubits; and [?]

(6) Of a cubit, was the height of the rock over the head of the excavators . . . .

It is only a roughly scratched inscription of the nature of a graffito; the flowing nature of the writing is fully explained by Dr. Reissner's recent discovery of ostraca at Samaria written with pen and ink. It is not an official inscription, and consequently there is no kingly name and no date, but the prevalent view that it was made by the work people who carried out Hezekiah's great work (2 K 20 20) is now further confirmed by the character of the Heb in the ostraca which Reissner dates as of the time of Ahab.

Unfortunately this priceless monument of antiquity was violently removed from its place by some miscreants. The fragments have been collected and are now pieced together in the Constantinople museum. Fortunately several excellent "squeezes" as well as transcriptions were made before the inscription was broken up, so that the damage done is to be regretted rather on sentimental than on literary grounds. SILOAM, TOWER IN. See JERUSALEM; SILOAM.

SILVANUS, sil-vā′nus (Σιλουανός, Silouanós [2 Cor 1 19]). See SILAS.

SILVER, sil′vẽr (כֶּסֶף, keṣeph; ἀργύριον, argúrion, ἄργυρος, árguros): Silver was known in the earliest historic times. Specimens of early Egyp and Bab silver work testify to the skill of the ancient silversmiths. In Pal, silver objects have been found antedating the occupation of the land by the Hebrews. This metal was used for making all kinds of ornamental objects. In the mound of Gezer were found bowls, vases, ladles, hairpins, rings and bracelets of silver. The rings and settings for scarabs or seals were commonly of this metal. The first mention of silver in the Bible is in Gen 13 2, where it says that Abraham was rich in cattle, in silver and gold. At that time it was commonly used in exchange in the form of bars or other shapes. Coins of that metal were of a much later date (Gen 20 16; 23 15; 24 53; 37 28, etc). Booty was collected in silver (Josh 6 19); tribute was paid in the same (1 K 15 19). It was also used for jewelry (Gen 44 2). The Children of Israel systematically despoiled the Egyptians of their silver before the exodus (Ex 3 22; 11 2; 12 35, etc). Ex 20 23 implies that idols were made of it. It was largely used in the fittings of the tabernacle (Ex 26 ff) and later of the temple (2 Ch 2 ff).

It is likely that the ancient supply of silver came from the mountains of Asia Minor where it is still found in abundance associated with lead as argentiferous galena, and with copper sulphide. The Turkish government mines this silver on shares with the natives. The Sinaitic peninsula probably also furnished some silver. Later Phoen ships brought quantities of it from Greece and Spain. The Arabian sources are doubtful (2 Ch 9 14). Although silver does not tarnish readily in the air, it does corrode badly in the limestone soil of Pal and Syria. This probably partly accounts for the small number of objects of this metal found. On the site of the ancient jewelers' shops of Tyre the writer found objects of gold, bronze, lead, iron, but none of silver.

Figurative: Silver to be as stones in Jerus (1 K 10 27) typified great abundance (cf Job 3 15; 22 25; 27 16; also Isa 60 17; Zec 9 3). The trying of men's hearts was compared to the refining of silver (Ps 66 10; Isa 48 10). Jeh's words were as pure as silver refined seven times (Ps 12 6). The gaining of understanding is better than the gaining of silver (Prov 3 14; cf 8 19; 10 20; 16 16; 22 1; 25 11). Silver become dross denoted deterioration (Isa 1 22; Jer 6 30). Breast and arms of silver was interpreted by Daniel to mean the inferior kingdom to follow Nebuchadnezzar's (Dnl 2 32. 39).

In the NT, reference should be made esp. to Acts 19 24; Jas 5 3; Rev 18 12. JAMES A. PATCH

SILVERLING, sil′vẽr-ling (אֶלֶף כֶּסֶף, 'eleph keṣeph [Isa 7 23]): 'A thousand of silver' means a thousand shekels. See PIECE OF SILVER.

SILVERSMITH, sil′vẽr-smith (ἀργυροκόπος, argurokópos): Mentioned only once (Acts 19 24), where reference is made to Demetrius, a leading member of the silversmiths' guild of Ephesus.

SIMALCUE, sī-mal-kū′ē: AV = RV IMALCUE (q.v.).

SIMEON, sim′ē-on (שִׁמְעוֹן, shim'ōn; Συμεών, Sumeōn; the Heb root is from שָׁמַע, shāma', "to hear" [Gen 29 33]; some modern scholars [Hitzig, W. R. Smith, Stade, etc] derive it from Arab. sima', "the offspring of the hyena and female wolf"): In Gen 29 33; 30 18–21; 35 23, Simeon is given as full brother to Reuben, Levi, Judah, Issachar and Zebulun, the son of Leah; and in Gen 34 25; 49 5 as the brother of Levi and Dinah. He was left as a hostage in Egypt by orders of Joseph (Gen 42 24; 43 23).

In the "blessing" of the dying Jacob, Simeon and Levi are linked together:

1. The Patriarch: Biblical Data

> "Simeon and Levi are brethren;
> Weapons of violence are their swords.
> O my soul, come not thou into their council;
> Unto their assembly, my glory, be not thou > united;
> For in their anger they slew a man,
> And in their self-will they hocked an ox.
> Cursed be their anger, for it was fierce;
> And their wrath, for it was cruel:
> I will divide them in Jacob,
> And scatter them in Israel" (Gen 49 5–7).

Whatever view may be taken of the events of Gen 34 25 (and some would see in it "a tradition of the settlement of Jacob which belongs to a cycle quite independent of the descent into Egypt and the Exodus" [see S. A. Cook, Enc Brit, art. "Simeon"]), it is clear that we have here a reference to it and the suggestion that the subsequent history of the tribe, and its eventual absorption in Judah, was the result of violence. In the same way the priestly Levites became distributed throughout the other tribes without any tribal inheritance of their own (Dt 18 1; Josh 13 14). From the mention (Gen 46 10; Ex 6 15) of Shaul as being the son of a Canaanite woman, it may be supposed that the tribe was a mixed one.

In the "blessing of Moses" (Dt 33) Simeon is not mentioned at all in the Heb text, although in some MSS of LXX the latter half of ver 6 is made to apply to him: "Let Simeon be a small company." The history of the tribe is scanty and raises many problems. Of the many theories advanced to meet them it cannot be said that any one answers all difficulties.

2. The Tribe in Scripture

In the wilderness of Sinai the Simeonites camped beside the Reubenites (Nu 2 12; 10 19); it was Zimri, a member of one of the leading families of this tribe, who was slain by Phinehas in the affair of Baal-peor (Nu 25 14). The statistics in Nu 1 22 f, where the Simeonites are given as 59,300, compared with the 2d census (Nu 26 14), where the numbers are 22,200, indicate a diminishing tribe. Some have connected this with the sin of Zimri.

At the recital of the law at Mt. Gerizim, Simeon is mentioned first among those that were to respond to the blessings (Dt 27 12). In the conquest of Canaan "Judah said unto Simeon his brother, Come up with me into my lot, that we may fight against the Canaanites; and I likewise will go with thee into thy lot. So Simeon went with him" (Jgs 1 3; cf ver 17). (Many scholars find in Gen 34 a tribal attempt on the part of the Simeonites to gain possession of Shechem; if this is so, Judah did not assist, and the utter failure may have been a cause of Simeon's subsequent dependence upon, and final absorption in, Judah.) In Jgs 4 and 5 Simeon is never mentioned. In the settlement of the land there is no account of how Simeon established himself in his territory (except the scanty reference in Jgs 1 3), but "their inheritance was in the midst of the inheritance of the children of Judah" (Josh 19 1); this is accounted for (ver 9), "for the portion of the children of Judah was too much for them." Nevertheless we find there the very cities which are apportioned to Simeon, allotted to Judah (Josh 15 21–32; cf Neh 11 26–29). It is suggested (in 1 Ch 4 31) that the independent possession of these cities ceased in the time of David. David sent spoil to several Simeonite towns (1 S 30 26 f), and in 1 Ch 12 25 it is recorded that 7,100 Simeonite warriors came to David in Hebron. In 1 Ch 27 16 we have mention of a ruler of the Simeonites, Shephatiah, son of Maacah.

In 1 Ch 4 39 f mention is made of certain isolated exploits of Simeonites at Gedor (q.v.), against the Meunim (q.v.), and at Mt. Seir (q.v.). Later references associate certain Simeonites with the Northern Kingdom (2 Ch 15 9; 34 6), and tradition has come to view them as one of the ten tribes (cf Ezk 48 24.25.33; Rev 7 7), although all the history of them we have is bound up with Judah and the Southern Kingdom. There is no mention of the return of any Simeonites after the captivity; their cities fall to Judah (Neh 11 26 f).

3. References in Egyp and Assyr Inscriptions

It has been supposed by many authorities that the name Shimʽan occurs in the list of places plundered by Thothmes III (see Petrie, Hist, II, 104; also Hommel, AHT, 268; Sayce, Early Heb Traditions, 392). In the 7th cent. we have a doubtful reference in an inscription of Esar-haddon relating his Egyp campaign when a city Ap-ku is mentioned as in the country of Sa-me-n(a), which may possibly be a reference to Simeon. The survival of the name so late, if true, is strange, in the light of what we gather from the Bible about the tribe. (For discussion of both of these inscriptions, with references to the lit., see EB, coll. 4528–30.)

4. The Territory of Simeon

The cities of Simeon as given in Josh 19 2–6 and 1 Ch 4 28.31 are (the names in parentheses are variations in the latter reference): Beer-sheba, Moladah, Hazar-shual, Balah (Bilhah), Azem (AV) (Ezem), Eltolad (Tolad), Bethuel, Hormah, Ziklag, Beth-marcaboth, Hazar-susah (Hazar Susim), Beth-lebaoth (Beth-biri), Sharuhen (Shaaraim) (Etam), Ain Rimmon, Ether (Tochen), Ashan—in all, 16 cities in Josh and 17 in 1 Ch. Ashan (1 Ch 6 59) is the only one assigned to the priests. It is written wrongly as "Ain" in Josh 21 16. All the above cities, with certain variations in form, and with the exception of Etam in 1 Ch 4 32, which is probably a mistake, occur in the list of the cities of Judah (Josh 15 26–32.42). Ziklag is mentioned (1 S 27 6) as being the private property of the kings of Judah from the days of David, who received it from Achish, king of Gath.

For the situation of these cities, so far as is known, see separate arts. under their names. It is clear that they were all situated in the southwestern part of Pal, and that Simeon had no definite territorial boundaries, but isolated cities, with their villages, among those of the people of Judah.

SIMEON (שִׁמְעוֹן, shimʽōn; Συμεών, Sumeṓn): (1) The 2d son of Jacob by Leah (see separate art.).

(2) Great-grandfather of Judas Maccabaeus (1 Macc 2 1).

(3) A man in Jerus described as "righteous and devout, looking for the consolation of Israel." When the infant Jesus was brought into the Temple, he took Him into his arms and blessed God in words which are famous as the Nunc dimittis. Simeon bestowed his blessing on the wondering father and mother (Lk 2 25.34). Legend has made him the son of Hillel and father of Gamaliel I, but this has no historical basis.

(4) An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 30); RV "Symeon."

(5) RV "Symeon": one of the prophets and teachers in the Christian community at Antioch. He is also called Niger, which was the gentile name he had assumed, Symeon being Heb. He was among those who set apart Paul and Barnabas for their missionary work (Acts 13 1.2). Nothing more is known of him.

(6) RV "Symeon": the Heb name of Simon Peter (Acts 15 14).

S. F. Hunter

SIMEON (NIGER, nī′jẽr): AV in Acts 13 1, RV "Symeon" (q.v.).

SIMEONITES, sim′ē-on-īts. See Simeon.

SIMILITUDE, si-mil′i-tūd: In AV means either "an exact facsimile" (Ps 106 20 AV, RV "likeness"; Rom 5 14, etc), or else "the form itself" (Nu 12 8; Dt 4 12.15.16 for t^emūnāh, "form" [so RV]); cf Likeness. ERV has retained the word in 2 Ch 4 3; Dnl 10 16 (ARV "likeness"), while ERV and ARV have used "similitudes" in Hos 12 10 (דָּמָה, dāmāh, "be like"). The meaning is "I have inspired the prophets to speak parables."

SIMON (Σίμων, Símōn, Gr form of Simeon [q.v.]): The persons of the name of Simon mentioned in the Apocrypha are:

(1) Simon the Maccabean (Hasmonean), surnamed Thassi (q.v.), the 2d son of Mattathias and elder brother of Judas Maccabaeus. On his deathbed, Mattathias commended Simon as a "man of counsel" to be a "father" to his brethren (1 Macc 2 65), and a "man of counsel" he proved himself. But it was not till after the death of Judas and the capture of Jonathan that he played the chief rôle. Dispatched by Judas with a force to the relief of the Jews in Galilee he fought with great success (5 17 ff; Jos, Ant, XII, viii, 1 f). We find him next taking revenge along with Jonathan on the "children of Jambri" (1 Macc 9 33 ff), and coöperating in the successful campaign around Bethbasi against Bacchides (c 156 BC) (9 62 ff), and in the campaign against Apollonius (10 74 ff). In the conflict between Tryphon and Demetrius II, Simon was appointed by Antiochus VI "captain from the Ladder of Tyre unto the borders of Egypt" (11 59). After the capture of Jonathan at Ptolemais by Tryphon, Simon became acknowledged leader of his party. He thwarted Tryphon in his attempts upon Jerus, in revenge for which the latter murdered Jonathan (13 23). Simon then took the side of Demetrius on condition of immunity for Judaea, and so 'in the 170th year' (143–142 BC) 'the yoke of the heathen was taken away from Israel' (13 41). Simon applied himself to rebuild the strongholds of Judaea, reduced Gazara, captured the Acra (citadel) and made Joppa a seaport. He showed his wisdom most of all in his internal administration: "He sought the good of his country"; commerce and agriculture revived; lawlessness was suppressed, and "the land had rest all the days of Simon" (14 4 ff). His power was acknowledged by Sparta and Rome (14 16 ff). In 141 BC he was appointed by the nation leader, high priest and captain "for ever, until there should arise a faithful prophet" (14 41 ff), and thus the Hasmonean dynasty was founded. A new chronological era began with the first year of his administration, and he minted his own coins. A few years later Simon again meddled in Syrian politics (139 BC), this time at the entreaty of Antiochus VII (Sidetes) in his contest against Tryphon; when, however, Antiochus was assured of success, he refused the help of Simon and sent Cendebaeus against Judaea. Judas and John, sons of Simon, defeated the invaders near Modin (137–136 BC). In 135 BC Simon met his death by treachery. Ptolemy the son of Abubus, Simon's own son-in-law, determined to secure supreme power for himself and, in order to accomplish this, to assassinate the whole family of Simon. He accordingly invited Simon and his sons to a banquet in the stronghold of Dok near Jericho, where he treacherously murdered Simon with his two sons Mattathias and Judas. The other son, John Hyrcanus, governor of Gazara, received intimation of the plot and saved himself to become the head of the Hasmonean dynasty. "The significance of Simon's administration consists in this, that he completed the work of Jonathan and left the Jewish people absolutely independent of Syria" (Schürer). See Maccabaeus, II, 4.

(2) Simon I, the high priest, son of Onias I, whom he succeeded c 300 BC. He was one of the last of the Great Synagogue, and to him is attributed the saying, "On three things the world depends—the Law, worship and the showing of kindness." According to Jos (Ant, XII, ii, 5) this Simon was called "the Just" (ὁ δίκαιος, ho díkaios), "on account of his piety and his benevolent disposition toward his countrymen."

Many authorities (Herzfeld, Derenbourg, Stanley, Cheyne) assert that Jos is wrong in attaching this epithet to Simon I instead of Simon II, and Schürer is not certain on this question. But the Talm passage which Derenbourg cites means the opposite of what he takes it, viz. it is intended to show how splendid and holy were the days of Simeon (ha-çaddīk) compared with the later days. Besides, Jos is more likely to have known the truth on this matter than these later authorities. The same uncertainty obtains as to whether the eulogium in Sir 50 1 ff of "the great priest" refers to Simon I or Simon II. Schürer and others refer it to Simon II. It is more likely to refer to the Simon who was famous as "the Just," and consequently to Simon I. Besides we know of no achievements of Simon II to entitle him to such praise. The building operations mentioned would suit the time of Simon I better, as Ptolemy captured Jerus and probably caused considerable destruction. The Talm states that this Simon (and not Jaddua) met Alexander the Great.

(3) Simon II, high priest, son of Onias II and grandson of Simon I and father of Onias III, flourished about the end of the 3d cent. BC, and was succeeded by his son Onias III c 198 BC. Jos says that this Simon in the conflict of the sons of Joseph sided with the elder sons against Hyrcanus the younger. Schürer (probably incorrectly) thinks he is the Simon praised in Sir 50 1 ff. See (2) above (3 Macc 2 1; Jos, Ant, XII, iv, 10).

(4) Simon, a Benjamite, guardian of the temple, who, having quarreled with the high priest Onias III, informed Apollonius of the untold sums of money in the temple treasury. Apollonius laid the matter before the king Seleucus IV, who sent Heliodorus to remove the money. An apparition prevented Heliodorus from accomplishing his task (2 Macc 3 4 ff). It is further recorded, that Simon continued his opposition to Onias. He is spoken of as brother of the renegade Menelaus (4 23). Of his end we know nothing.

(5) Simon Chosameus (B [and Swete], Χοσάμαος, Chosámaos, A, Χοσομαῖος, Chosomaíos), one of the sons of Annas who had married "strange wives" (1 Esd 9 32). Simon apparently = "Shimeon" (shim'ōn) of the sons of Harim (Ezr 10 31); Chosameus is probably a corruption standing in the place of, but not resembling, any of the three names: Benjamin, Malluch, Shemaraiah, which Esd omits from the Ezr list.

SIMON, sī'mon (Σίμων, Simōn):

(1) Simon Peter. See Peter (Simon).

(2) Another of the Twelve, Simon "the Canaanaean" (Mt 10 4; Mk 3 18), "the Zealot" (Lk 6 15; Acts 1 13). See Cananaean.

(3) One of the brethren of Jesus (Mt 13 55; Mk 6 3). See Brethren of the Lord.

(4) "The leper" in Bethany, in whose house a woman poured a cruse of precious ointment over the head of Jesus (Mt 26 6; Mk 14 3). He had perhaps been healed by Jesus; in that case his ungracious behavior was not consistent with due gratitude. However he was healed, the title referred to his condition in the past, as lepers were ostracized by law.

(5) A Pharisee in whose house a woman, "a sinner," wet the feet of Jesus with her tears, and anointed them with ointment (Lk 7 36 ff). By some he is identified with (4), this being regarded as Luke's version of the incident recorded in Mt 26 and Mk 14. Others as strongly deny this view. For discussion see Mary, IV.

(6) A man of Cyrene, who was compelled to carry the cross of Jesus (Mt 27 32; Mk 15 21; Lk 23 26). Mark calls him "the father of Alexander and Rufus," well-known members of the church at (probably) Rome (cf Acts 19 33; Rom 16 13). See Cyrenian.

(7) The father of Judas Iscariot (Jn 6 71; 12 4 AV, RV omits; 13 2.26).

(8) Simon Magus (Acts 8 9 ff). See separate article.

(9) Simon, the tanner, with whom Peter lodged at Joppa. His house was by the seaside outside the city wall, because of its ceremonial uncleanness to a Jew, and also for reasons of sanitation (Acts 9 43).

1. Simon, a Magician

The name or term "Magus" is not given to him in the NT, but is justly used to designate or particularize him on account of the incident recorded in Acts 8 9–24, for though the word "Magus" does not occur, yet in ver 9 the present participle mageúōn is used, and is tr^d, both in AV and in RV, "used sorcery." Simon accordingly was a sorcerer, he "bewitched the people of Samaria" (AV). In ver 11 it is also said that "of long time he had amazed" them "with his sorceries" (magíais). The claim, given out by himself, was that he "was some great one"; and this claim was acknowledged by the Samaritans, for previous to the introduction of the gospel into Samaria, "they all gave heed [to him], from the least to the greatest, saying, This man is that power of God which is called Great" (ver 10).

2. Simon and the Apostles

(1) It so happened, however, that Philip the deacon and evangelist went down from Jerus to Samaria, and "proclaimed unto them the Christ" (ver 5); and as the result of the proclamation of the gospel, many were gathered into the Christian church. Many miracles also were performed by Philip, sick persons cured, and demons cast out; and Simon fell under the influence of all these things, both of the preaching and of "the signs." So great was the impression now made upon Simon that he "believed" (ver 13). This means, at least, that he saw that Philip was able in the name of Jesus Christ to display powers greater than anything he himself was acquainted with: Philip's power was greater by far than Simon's. He therefore came forward as one of the new converts, and was baptized. After his baptism he continued with Philip. The signs which accompanied the introduction of the gospel into this city did not cease, and Simon seeing them "was amazed." The word denoting Simon's amazement at the "signs" wrought by Philip is the same as that used to express how the people of Samaria had been amazed at Simon's sorceries. It is an indication of the nature of the faith which he possessed in the gospel—wondering amazement at a new phenomenon not yet understood, not repentance or trust in Christ.

(2) News having reached Jerus of the events which had occurred in Samaria, the apostles sent Peter and John to establish the work there. These two apostles prayed for the converts that they might receive the Holy Ghost, which they had not yet received. And when they had laid their hands upon the converts, the Spirit was given to them. At this early period in the history of the church the Holy Ghost was bestowed in a visible manner which showed itself in such miraculous gifts as are described in Acts 2. Simon saw what had taken place, and then, instead of joining the company of those who had truly repented and trusted Christ, he came forward with the same amazement as he had previously shown, and offered money to Peter and John, if they would impart to him the power of giving the Holy Ghost to others. Peter instantly rebuked this bold and ungodly request, and did so with such sternness as to cause Simon to ask that the judgment threatened by the apostle might not fall upon him.

Such is the unenviable history of Simon Magus, as it is recorded in the NT. Later centuries have shown their estimation of the heinousness of Simon's sin by employing his name to indicate the crime of buying or selling a spiritual office for a price in money—"simony."

3. The Magicians and the Gospel

It is not strange to find the gospel brought into direct conflict with magicians, for in the 1st and 2d cents. there were a multitude of such persons who pretended to possess supernatural powers by which they endeavored to deceive men. They flattered the sinful inclinations of the human heart, and fell in with men's current ways of thinking, and required no self-renunciation at all. For these reasons the magicians found a ready belief on the part of many. The emperor Tiberius, in his later years, had a host of magicians in constant attendance upon him. Elymas, with whom Paul came in contact in Cyprus "was with the deputy of the country, Sergius Paulus, a prudent man" (Acts 13 7 AV). Elymas was one of those magicians, and he endeavored to turn away the deputy from the faith. Luke expressly calls this man "magus," Elymas the magus (Acts 13 6.8 m).

The influence of such persons presented an obstacle to the progress of the Christian faith, which had to force its way through the delusions with which these sorcerers had surrounded the hearts of those whom they deceived. When the gospel came in contact with these magicians and with their works, it was necessary that there should be striking facts, works of supernatural power strongly appealing to men's outward senses, in order to bring them out of the bewilderment and deception in which they were involved, and to make them able to receive the impression of spiritual truth. Such miracles were wrought both in Cyprus and in Samaria, the spheres of influence of the magicians Elymas and Simon. These Divine works first arrested men's attention, and then dispelled the delusive influence of the sorcerers.

4. Testimony of Early Writers

(1) The history of Simon Magus does not close with what is narrated in the Acts, for the early Christian writers have much to say in regard to him.

Justin Martyr, himself a Samaritan, states that Simon Magus was a "Samaritan from the village called Gittōn." Justin also relates that, in the time of Claudius Caesar, Simon was worshipped as a god at Rome on account of his magical powers, and that a statue had been erected to him, on the island in the river Tiber, with the inscription Simoni Deo Sancto, that is, "To Simon the sacred god." Curiously enough, in the year 1574, a stone which appears to have served as a pedestal of a statue, was dug up in the Tiber at the spot described by Justin; and on it were inscribed the words Semoni Sanco Deo Fidio Sacrum, that is, the stone then discovered was dedicated to the god Semo Sancus, the Sabine Hercules. This antiquarian find makes it probable that Justin was mistaken in what he said about a statue having been erected in honor of Simon Magus. "It is incredible that the folly should ever be carried to such an extent as that a statue should be erected, and the senate should pass a decree enrolling Simon Magus among the deos Romanos" (Neander, Church History, II, 123). The inscription found in 1574 shows the source of the error into which Justin had fallen.

There are many stories told by some of the early Christian writers regarding Simon Magus, but they are full of legend and fable: some of them are improbable in the extreme and border on the impossible.

(2) Jerome, who professes to quote from writings of Simon, represents him as employing these words in reference to himself, "I am the Word of God, I am the Comforter, I am Almighty, I am all there is of God" (Mansel, The Gnostic Heresies, 82). Irenaeus (Mansel, ib, 82) writes regarding him: "Simon, having purchased a certain woman named Helena, who had been a prostitute in the city of Tyre, carried her about with him, and said that she was the first conception of his mind, the mother of all things, by whom, in the beginning, he conceived the thought of making the angels and archangels; for that this conception proceeded forth from him, and knowing her father's wishes, she descended to the lower world, and produced the angels and powers; by whom also he said that this world was made. But after she had produced them, she was detained by them through envy, since they were unwilling to be considered the offspring of any other being; for he himself was entirely unknown by them; but his conception was detained by those powers and angels which were put forth from her, and suffered every insult from them that she might not return upward to her father; and this went so far that she was even confined within a human body, and for ages passed into other female bodies, as if from one vessel into another. He said also that she was that Helen, on whose account the Trojan war was fought . . . . and that after passing from one body to another, and constantly meeting with insult, at last she became a public prostitute, and that this was the lost sheep. On this account he himself came, that he might first of all reclaim her and free her from her chains, and then give salvation to men through the knowledge of himself. For since the angels ruled the world badly, because one of them desired the chief place, he had come down for the restoration of all things, and had descended, being changed in figure, and made like to principalities and powers and angels, so that he appeared among men as a man, and was thought to have suffered in Judaea, though he did not suffer. . . . . Furthermore he said that the prophets uttered their prophecies under the inspiration of those angels who framed the world; for which reason they who rest their hope on him and his Helena no longer cared for them, but as free men could act as they pleased, for that men are saved by his [i.e. Simon's] grace, and not according to their own just works, for that no acts were just by nature, but by accident, according to the rules established by the angels, who made the world, and who attempt by these precepts to bring men into bondage. For this reason he promised that the world should be released, and those who are his set at liberty from the government of those who made the world."

5. Sources of Legendary History

The chief sources of the legendary history of Simon Magus are the collection of writings known as The Clementines (see LITERATURE, SUB-APOSTOLIC; PETER, FIRST EPISTLE OF; PETER, SECOND EPISTLE OF). What is there said of him is, that he studied at Alexandria, and that he had been, along with the heresiarch Dositheus, a disciple of John the Baptist. He became also a disciple of Dositheus, and afterward his successor. The Clementines comprise (1) The Homilies, (2) The Recognitions, and (3) The Epitome. These three are cognate works, and in part are identical. The date of The Homilies may be placed about 160 AD. The contents comprise a supposed letter from the apostle Peter to the apostle James, along with other matter. Then follow the homilies, of which there are twenty. These record the supposed travels of Clement, a Rom citizen. Clement meets with Barnabas and with Peter. Then there is narrated a discussion between Peter and Simon Magus. This disputation lasts for three days, Simon maintaining that there are two gods, and that the God of the OT is an imperfect being. Simon Magus withdraws to Tyre and then to Sidon. Peter follows Simon from place to place, counteracting his sorceries, and instructing the people. At Laodicea a second disputation takes place between the apostle and Simon on the same subjects.

The Homilies are not a Christian protest against Gnosticism, but merely that of one gnostic school or sect against another, the Ebionite against the Marcionite. The Deity of Christ is denied, and He is regarded as one of the Jewish prophets.

In the legends Simon is represented as constantly opposing Peter, who ultimately discredits and vanquishes him. These legends occur in more forms than one, the earlier form selecting Antioch as the place where Simon was discomfited by the apostle and where he also died, while the later tradition chooses Rome for these events.

6. Traditions of His Death

One tradition tells how the magician ordered his followers to bury him in a grave, promising that if this were done, he would rise again on the third day. They did as he wished and buried him; but this was the end of him, for he did not rise again.

Simon is said to have met his death at Rome, after an encounter with the apostle Peter. During this his final controversy with the apostle, Simon had raised himself in the air by the help of evil spirits, and in answer to the prayer of Peter and Paul he was dashed to the ground and killed.

According to another form of this tradition, Simon proposed to give the Rom emperor a proof of his power by flying off to God. He succeeded, it is said, in flying for a certain distance over Rome, but in answer to the prayer of Peter he fell and broke one of his legs. This tradition accounts for his end by saying that the people stoned him to death.

7. The Simoniani

The Simoniani, the Simonians or followers of Simon, were an eclectic sect, who seem, at one time, to have adopted tenets and opinions derived from paganism, at another, from Judaism and the beliefs of the Samaritans, and at another still, from Christianity. Sometimes they seem to have been ascetics; at others they are wild scoffers at moral law. They regarded Simon Magus as their Christ, or at least as a form of manifestation of the redeeming Christ, who had manifested Himself also in Jesus. The Simonians were one of the minor gnostic sects and were carried far away both from the doctrine and from the ethical spirit of the Christian faith.

Origen denies that the followers of Simon were Christians in any sense. The words of Origen are, "It escapes the notice of Celsus that the Simonians do not in any way acknowledge Jesus as the Son of God, but they call Simon the Power of God." In the time of Origen the followers of Simon had dwindled in number to such a degree that he writes, "I do not think it possible to find that all the followers of Simon in the whole world are more than thirty: and perhaps I have said more than there really are" (Contr. Cels., i.57, quoted by Alford, Gr NT, Acts 8 9).

8. Was Simon the Originator of Gnosticism?

Irenaeus also has much to say regarding Simon and his followers. He makes the legendary Simon identical with the magician of Acts 8, makes him also the first in the list which he gives of heretics, and also says that it was from him that Gnosticism sprang. The account which he gives of the Simonians shows that by the time when Irenaeus lived, their system had developed into Gnosticism; but this fact does not justify Irenaeus in the assertion that Simon of Acts 8 is the originator of the gnostic system. The early Christian writers took this view, and regarded Simon Magus as the founder of Gnosticism. Perhaps they were right, "but from the very little authentic information we possess, it is impossible to ascertain how far he was identified with their tenets" (Alford, NT, II, 86). In the midst of the various legends regarding Simon, it may be that there is a substratum of fact, of such a nature that future investigation and discovery will justify these early Christian writers in their judgment, and will show that Simon Magus is not to be overlooked as one of the sources from which Gnosticism sprang. The exact origin of Gnosticism is certainly difficult to trace, but there is little or no indication that it arose from the incidents narrated in Acts 8. It cannot be denied that a connection is possible, and may have existed between the two, that is between Simon Magus and some of the gnostic heresies; but the facts of history show widespread tendencies at work, during and even before the Apostolic age, which amply account for the rise of Gnosticism. These are found e.g. in the Alexandrian philosophy, and in the tenets of the false teachers at Colossae and in other places. These philosophical and theosophical ideas commingled with the influences of Zoroastrianism from Persia, and of Buddhism from India, and these tendencies and influences, taken in conjunction, were the sources of the various heresies known by the name of Gnosticism. See Gnosticism.

SIMON PETER. See Peter, Simon.

SIMON THE CANAANITE, OR CANANAEAN, OR ZEALOT (Σίμων Καναναῖος, Símōn Kananaíos; קַנָּאִי, kannā'ī, "the Jealous [or Zealous] One"): One of the Twelve Apostles. This Simon was also named "the Canaanite" (Mt 10 4; Mk 3 18 AV) or "the Cananaean" (Mt 10 4; Mk 3 18 RV) or "Zelotes" (Lk 6 15; Acts 1 13 AV) or "the Zealot" (Lk 6 15; Acts 1 13 RV).

According to the "Gospel of the Ebionites" or "Gospel of the Twelve Apostles" (of the 2d cent. and mentioned by Origen) Simon received his call to the apostleship along with Andrew and Peter, the sons of Zebedee, Thaddaeus and Judas Iscariot at the Sea of Tiberias (cf Mt 4 18–22; see also Hennecke, Neutestamentliche Apokryphen, 24–27).

Although Simon, like the majority of the apostles, was probably a Galilean, the designation "Cananaean" is regarded as of political rather than of geographical significance (cf St. Luke's rendering). The Zealots were a faction, headed by Judas of Galilee, who "in the days of the enrolment" (cf Acts 5 37; Lk 2 1.2) bitterly opposed the threatened increase of taxation at the census of Quirinius, and would have hastened by the sword the fulfilment of Messianic prophecy.

Simon has been identified with Simon the brother of Jesus (Mk 6 3; Mt 13 55), but there also are reasons in favor of identifying him with Nathanael.

Thus (1) all the arguments adduced in favor of the Bartholomew-Nathanael identification (see Nathanael) can equally be applied to that of Simon-Nathanael, except the second. But the second is of no account, since the Philip-Bartholomew connection in the Synoptists occurs merely in the apostolic lists, while in St. John it is narrative. Further, in the Synoptists, Philip is connected in the narrative, not with Bartholomew but with Andrew.

(2) The identity is definitely stated in the Genealogies of the Twelve Apostles (see Nathanael). Further, the "Preaching of Simon, son of Cleopas" (cf Budge, II, 70 ff) has the heading "The preaching of the blessed St. Simon, the son of Cleopas, who was surnamed Judas, which is interpreted Nathanael, who became bishop of Jerus after James the brother of Our Lord." Eusebius (HE, III, xi, 32; IV, xxii) also refers to a Simon who succeeded James as bishop of Jerus and suffered martyrdom under Trajan; and Hegesippus, whom Eusebius professes to quote, calls this Simon a son of Cleopas.

(3) The invitation of Philip to Nathanael (cf Jn 1 45) was one which would naturally be addressed to a follower of the Zealots, who based their cause on the fulfilment of Messianic prophecy.

(4) As Alphaeus, the father of James, is generally regarded as the same as Clopas or Cleopas (see JAMES, SON OF ALPHAEUS), this identification of the above Simon Nathanael, son of Cleopas, with Simon Zelotes would shed light on the reason of the juxtaposition of James son of Alphaeus and Simon Zelotes in the apostolic lists of St. Luke and Acts, i.e. they were brothers.

C. M. KERR

SIMPLE, sim'p'l: In the OT the uniform tr of the Heb word pethī (root pāthāh, "be open"). Like the Eng. word "simple" (etymologically "of one fold"), the Heb pethī is used sometimes in a good sense, i.e. "open-minded" (Ps 19 7; 116 6; 119 130, possibly in all three cases the sense is neutral rather than positively good), and sometimes in a bad sense (Prov 7 7, ‖ to "destitute of understanding"; 8 5, ‖ to "fools" [blockheads]; 14 15, opposed to prudent). The fundamental idea of pethī seems to be open to influence, i.e. easily influenced. That one open to influence should as a rule be classed with the irreligious is one of many instances in which language is an unwilling witness to the miasmatic moral atmosphere in which we live. The line between moral weakness and moral turpitude, between negative goodness (if indeed such a thing be conceivable) and positive badness, is soon passed.

In the NT the word "simple" is found only in Rom 16 18.19 AV. In the first of these passages it is used to translate ákakos (RV "innocent"). In He 7 26 AV the same word is rendered "harmless," the rendering of RV in this instance being "guileless." This would suit Rom 16 18 better than "innocent." Guilelessness is not a synonym for gullibility; but the guileless are frequently the prey of designing men. In Rom 16 19 the word tr^{d} "simple" is akéraios, lit. "unmixed," "sincere" (Trench and Godet; Young, erroneously "hornless" and so "harmless"). "Uncontaminated" seems to be the idea of the apostle. He would have those to whom he wrote "wise as regards good" and not ignorant as regards evil—for that would be impossible, even if desirable—but without that kind of knowledge of evil that comes from engaging in it, as we say, mixing themselves up with it, unalloyed with evil.

W. M. MCPHEETERS

SIMPLICITY, sim-plis'i-ti (פְּתַיּוּת, p^{e}thayyūth; ἁπλότης, haplótēs): The words in the OT commonly tr^{d} "simplicity" are pethī, "simple" (Prov 1 22), p^{e}thayyūth, "simplicity" (9 13 m), tōm, "completeness," "integrity" (2 S 15 11), "They went in their simplicity." In the NT, haplotēs, "singleness of mind," "simplicity," occurs in Rom 12 8, "He that giveth let him do it with simplicity," RV "liberality," m "Gr 'singleness'"; 2 Cor 1 12, "in simplicity and godly sincerity," RV (with corrected text) "in holiness and sincerity of God"; 11 3, "the simplicity that is in Christ," RV (with corrected text) "the simplicity and the purity that is toward Christ"; cf Eph 6 5; Col 3 22, where the tr is "singleness." In Wisd 1 1 we have, "Think ye of the Lord with a good mind [AV "heart"], and in singleness [AV "simplicity"] of heart seek ye him" (haplotēs). Our Lord also speaks (Mt 6 22; Lk 11 34) of the "single eye" (haploús), and James (1 5) applies haplôs, "simply," "directly," without after-thought [AV and RV "liberally"] to God, who had been described by Plato (Rep. ii.382 E) as being perfectly simple (haplous) and true, both in word and deed. In such "simplicity"—openness, sincerity, freedom from double-mindedness—man most resembles God and is most open to His visitation and blessing.

LITERATURE

1. Elements of Definition

There is variety of description of sin in the Bible, rather than formal definition, hence the various elements must be gathered together. Sin is voluntary, ethical (Gen 3 2–6; Rom 1 18, 28) hence never necessarily inherent in man's physical or finite nature. The merely ethical conception of voluntary transgression of law is in the Bible not only taken up into the larger religious conception of a wrong attitude toward God's specific commands (Gen 3 3) and his law (Rom 3 19, 20), but is applied to the refusal to be guided in life by the restraining and directing influence of the knowledge of God's power (Rom 1 18, 28), of his nature (Jn 3 19), and of his love revealed in his Son (Jn 3 36). Such a knowledge of God comes to all men from their own nature (Rom 2 14, 15), from creation (Rom 1 20), and from the Spirit of God (Jn 1 9; Gen 6 3; Acts 7 51; 14 17). Transgression of known law, then, is sin; but so is wrong attitude, wrong desires, wrong "set" of the will or self (pesh^{c}, àsebcia, rebellion; ^{c}wōn, adikía, perversion; r^{c}, resh^{c}, ruin, confusion: apostasia, epithumía; 1 Jn 3 4; Mt 5 22, 28; Rom 7 8 ff; 5 21). Sin is thus unbelief (He 3 12, 19), the centering of the self upon something, or some one, less than God himself (Gen 3 6; Rom 1 28; 8 7).

2. Definition

Sin is any attitude of indifference, unbelief, or disobedience to the will of God revealed in conscience, law, or gospel—whether this attitude express itself in thought, word, deed, or settled disposition and conduct.

3. Effects of Sin

According to the Bible, sin has direct effect under the immanent laws of creation, and also brings on men the retributive action of God. Under psychological law sin involves the whole self in perverting man from his highest possibilities, darkening the mind, inflaming the passions, and hardening the will against God and all good (Rom 1 21–32; Gal 5 19 ff). Under the law of heredity sin transmits evil tendency and guilt to the sinner's offspring (Ps 51 5, 6; Eph 2 3). The first sin thus involved the race, and sin always tends to be self-propagating, intensively and extensively. See HEREDITY; TRADITION. Sin also brings upon the sinner the direct punishment of God here (Ps 51 11; Rom 1 28; 6 23), and hereafter (Rom 2 8, 9). On these facts are built up the various systems of theology, with their differing conceptions of sin and of imputation of the first sin and of final judgment and rewards.

Probably all students admit that the story of the fall (Gen 3 1–6) is psychologically a wonderful account of how sin begins. There is voluntary disobedience of an explicit command of God their creator and friend—the disobedience not being in any sense a necessity of their nature or state. It is suggested to our first parents that the prohibition is not clearly understood; that the threatened punishment is not certain; that a privilege is arbitrarily and selfishly denied them; the appeal is made to an appetite innocent in itself. The imagination of the woman is stirred by the prospect of promised enjoyment and power; desire is aroused; then the deed follows as choice. All of this is amazingly true to actual experience of temptation and sin. There are elements of the story specially worthy of notice. In a sense it is a moral test, but more truly a religious test; the trial was whether they would believe God and trust him. The prohibition tested whether they would make God the center and goal of their lives, or whether they would center their lives about their own purposes—the inevitable religious test we all face soon or late. Note, too, that the sin is first inner, the fall is first in imagination and affection and thought, then in deed. The sin must be seen against the facts that they knew God and his explicit command; and against the fact that God's love did not leave them, but sought them after the sinful deed. The test therefore was necessary alike to the nature of man and the purpose of God—to wit, man's self-realization in right relation to God. The narrative, moreover, is presented not only as psychologically true, but as actual fact, as the historical beginning of sin, and is so held in the rest of the Bible (Jn 8 44; Rom 5 12 ff; 1 Cor 15 21, 22). On the face of it the narrative is not mythological or allegorical. But there are symbolical elements in it; to wit, "the serpent," his subtlety, his conversation, his change of form. The fact of man's creation as good, his living so for a time, his fall, and the historical beginning of sin all seem clearly taught, the exact significance of the details being an exegetical problem.

4. Story of the Fall

5. Sin and Freedom

A discussion of sin and its effects inevitably raises the question of sin and freedom. In the case of Adam and Eve, there is no difficulty in the Bible view, since they are represented as free from sinful bias, and freely choosing. Paul teaches that through the man's sin death passed to all men "for that all sinned" (Rom 5 12), and also that the natural man cannot keep the law (Rom 8 3–8); he insists that all are "by nature children of wrath" (Eph 2 3), and that only by the Spirit, and by being "in Christ," can we "fulfill the ordinance of the law." Yet Paul is insistent that sin is resistance of God and refusal to walk in the light (Rom 1 21, 28, 32), even while he insists that the law is hopeless as a way of salvation (Rom 3 20), and is a source of transgression (Rom 5 20). In like manner we find Jesus insisting that sin is free, conscious choice (Lk 15 13; Jn 15 22; 9 41; 8 11), at the same time that he insists there must be an entire change of the ruling affections of the natural man by regeneration (Jn 3 3, 6; Mt 7 18; 12 33). To this fact of universal, inherited evil tendency in man—and imputed guilt, see IMPUTATION III, 1—must be added the fact on which is based the theological doctrine of common grace, that God by his Spirit curbs the ravages of sin in the individual and in society, so that all men have conscience, a sense of divine law, of God and of civic virtue (Gen 6 3; Jn 1 9; Acts 7 51; 14 17; Rom 1 14, 15). These facts together present the Bible doctrine of the natural man as born with a corrupt nature, which is itself sinful, born guilty, yet never left by the Spirit without light. Every one who comes to years of discretion is free in the sense that he is self-determined, self-determined to evil. See REGENERATION.

6. Original Nature

What exactly is the inborn nature of the child is today at the end of the first quarter of the twentieth century one of the most widely and earnestly discussed questions. On the whole results are in line with Bible teachings as set forth above. All agree on inherited evil capacity (as well as good), the possibility of subconscious evil "set" of the self, the necessity of "moralizing" the child, inevitable struggle to hold moral positions, community moral solidarity, the danger of utter moral perversion, the emotional, passional control of life. Competent Christian educators seem agreed that inborn evil tendencies cannot be controlled in education save by supernatural "grace," and that the best Christian education can hope to be is an instrument to keep the child in relation to this divine power (cf Jerusalem Meeting International Missionary Council, Religious Education, Vol. II, pp. 3–89; Clark: Psychology of Religious Awakening, Macmillan, 1929, p. 95; Betts, New Program of Religious Education, pp. 39, 40).

7. Judgment of Actual Sin

The Bible makes very clear that individual, personal sin is to be judged according to the individual's personal light, and that in the matters he knows to be evil the individual must make his fight. This is very clear in Jesus (Jn 15 22; Mt 11 20 ff), and in Paul (Acts 17 30; Rom 14 5; 1 Cor 8 7; 1 Tim 1 13). This does not mean that the sinner fully knows the bitterness of sin before it is committed; sin committed, under the reproach of conscience, under the fear of God's anger, in view of some of its dreadful consequences, is very different from sin in contemplation. This fact that the individual's sin is to be judged by the light that he has means only that the Bible correctly reckons with the fact that conscience, so far as it comprises material judgments on actual facts, is largely mediated by social heredity and community standards. This is the reason why men of other times and other lands, like the Bible characters, must be judged by the light of their times as to the degree of their personal guilt or merit.

8. Inwardness of True Morality and Religion

The Bible shows wonderful progress from observance of indifferent forms to the true inwardness of morality and religion. The end of the process of revelation that began with matters in some sense little above taboo is the high and noble religion of the spirit as stated by Micah (6 8), Paul (Rom 8 4; 1 Cor 10 31; Gal 5 22 ff), and Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount.

(1) Mosaic code. There are elements of the code, like food taboos and forms of sacrifice, that have no moral significance in themselves. It must not be forgotten that, like the Edenic prohibition, these were of religious significance only by raising the question of obedience to Jehovah. The code therefore presupposes religious instruction, and symbolism to be developed, and thus leaves room for growth into the spirit of true religion and morality. According to the Bible the code was never without such interpretation.

(2) Prophets. The mission of the prophets was to educate the people in religion. They were therefore to become incarnate consciences and embodiments of true religion. Increasingly therefore is the emphasis placed on the moral meaning and spiritual intention of the forms. With Elijah and Elisha it may seem at times almost to be a matter of old forms and the national worship—though there is much more of real morality and religion in their messages, if one look for them—but the end of the movement is in Isaiah's "Is not this the fact that I have chosen:

to loose the bonds of wickedness. . . . ." (Isa 58). So insistent is this prophetic emphasis on the true meaning of religion and morality as the real purpose of the commandments and ceremonies imposed upon the Jewish people (Hos 6; Micah 6), that some have inferred from it that the prophets were antagonistic to the law and all its forms. It would be far truer to say that the prophets were so well taught of God the nature of morality and religion as the real purpose of law and form and promise that they became opposed to the law and sacrifice as mere forms without the true spirit. This tendency to be content with forms and external observances remains to this day the persistent vitiation of codes and liturgies. Needing form to express spirit, we lose the spirit and keep the form, and so destroy our purpose and fall into worse sins.

(3) Paul. The law has thus one of two effects on sinful human nature. It leads to superficiality and externalism, and thus to increased worse sin in the sight of God; or else, taken earnestly, it leads to utter despair of one's own rightness. In Paul it took this second trend. "Advancing in the Jew's religion beyond many of his own age among his countrymen, being more exceedingly zealous for the traditions of his fathers (Gal 1 14)," he nevertheless found that the law was his despair, inasmuch as it forbade not only wrong deeds but wrong desire (Rom 7); he found that the law revealed his carnal nature, that it became an instrument to work death in him. So he saw in law a means of God to make the trespass abound (Rom 5 20); and thus the law became a "tutor to bring us to Christ (Gal 3 24)" that we might all "die unto the law in order to live unto God" (Gal 2 19). Legalism as a means of salvation is dead; he knows the true inwardness of the law and the heart of true religion in being "under law to Christ (1 Cor 9 20 ff)," and so the law is kept in the real sense (Rom 8 2) "the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus."

(4) Jesus. In his views Paul shows how completely he had absorbed the spirit of Jesus. Jesus honors the law—no jot or tittle of it shall be abolished, it can only be fulfilled (Mt 5 17). But Jesus knows the only way to keep the law is from the heart and in spirit; the attitude, the desire, the purpose is all. Adultery, murder, and revenge are sin, of course; but causing these acts and the real source of sin that must be healed are lust and anger and the vengeful spirit. Purity, therefore, and love, and a forgiving spirit—these are the keeping of the law. Indeed, in going on to the principle "Ye shall therefore be perfect as your Father is perfect" (Mt 5 48) Jesus takes the same position later so well enunciated by Paul, that, as sin is never only ethical, but a matter of wrong attitude toward God and man, so morality and religion in reality are a matter of right spiritual attitude toward God and man (Mt 22 35; Lk 18 22). Every expression or codification, therefore, of moral law is imperfect, partial, an unsuccessful attempt to embody the true spirit (Rom 7 6; 2 Cor 3 6). Yet there is to be no disparagement of law: civil and moral codes are always necessary as guides, even though they can never express or create the true spirit of the citizen, the good man, or the Christian.

9. Power and Development

This powerlessness of mere law is due to the fact that sin is itself power and has its own law of development. Sin is not an entity—neither a material nor a spiritual substance. Sin is a quality of personal beings, which they ought not to have, substituted for a quality they ought to have. Sin is therefore privative, not negative. Man as person should know God's will, love God, and choose to obey—that is virtue and religion. Sin is not merely absence of this which ought to be; it is substituting for this another knowledge, another love, and another choice. The law of human personality is inter-relation of intellect, sensibility, and will, in the unity of the self, and the tendency to fixity of acts and moods into fixed attitudes of character. As the good man grows into truer knowledge, purer love, and settled habit of right-doing, so the evil man grows into false knowledge, into love of the foul, and hatred of the fair, into settled habits of doing wrong. The power of sin, then, is first of all the power of the law of personality perverted. This is clearly taught in Scripture. Paul makes clear that sinners become "vain in their reasonings, their senseless heart is darkened, they become fools" (Rom 1 22, 23); then follows the perversion of love and the kindling of lusts (vv 24–27), and the "reprobate" mind settled in doing all manner of evil (vs 28 ff); until finally there is the state "darkened in their understanding, alienated from God, ... past feeling, given up to lasciviousness, working all uncleanness with greediness" (Eph 4 17 ff). Such is the Biblical conception of the power of sin. All of this has been made much clearer for our understanding by present-day psychology as shown, e.g., in the psychology of association and habit as developed by Prof. William James (cf Steven, Psychology of the Christian Soul, ch iv) and in the later psychology with its emphasis on emotion, desire, the subconscious set of character, and the power of the subconscious complex. The effect of sin is thus to prevent the achievement of personality, making the individual the plaything of lust and impulses and solicitation from without, involving the disintegration of the self; or else sin's effect is to concentrate the powers of the individual about some strong ambition contrary to God, producing a powerful personality hating God and loving evil.

10. Heredity

One would expect a power so blasting to the individual to have bad effect on his offspring. Yet the Bible has practically nothing to say on heredity in its psychological or biological sense. The one great fact is asserted, that through the one sin of the first Adam all "flesh" is sinful, i.e., the natural man; beyond that it knows nothing of transmitted sinful tendencies due to special sins of the parents. See Heredity. Present science on the whole bears out this view. It knows of children born subnormal in mental power, with emotional instability or deadness and some with far stronger appetites than others; little progress, however, has been made in connecting this with special characteristics in the life of the parents. Some individuals inherit insanity; but this seems a matter of certain blood strains, or families, and difficult to connect in any way with special sins in parents.

11. Social Heredity

The Bible makes much more of what we today call the social heredity of sin, that is, the transmission of sin to others through example, teaching, suggestion in all its forms, group opinions, tastes, standards, institutions—in a word, communication in its full sociological meaning. The Bible is packed full of warnings against association with evil persons; the power of evil example; the deadliness of wrong customs and social usages; the power of the leaven of wrong doctrine and teaching. No literature ever stressed more strongly the duty of training up children in godly families, of instructing them in truth and training them by example and in the actual performance of right deeds. The whole trend of its exhortation is to gather the godly into families and groups with their own thought and standards, usages and devotions, and to separate them from every possible association with evil. The pictures it gives of Sodom, of the world before the flood, of the world of the Canaanites that were to be destroyed before tribes settled in the promised land; or of the society of the Roman world as Paul saw it; these all are in full accord not only with truth, but with what modern sociology has learned about social law. This terrible fact of the fell power of sin, through this totality of influence by all recognized laws of social heredity, throws light on both the command to destroy the Canaanites, and on the exhortations in various form to Christians to live as a separate people. The Bible indeed gathers up this total power of evil through social heredity and social groups under the term "the world," "the mass of men alienated from God and hostile to Christ, the whole circle of earthly goods, endowments, riches, pleasures, which although hollow, frail and fleeting, stir desire, seduce from God, and are obstacles to the cause of Christ" (Thayer, Gr-Engl Lex. of NT, 6, 7). In this sense, "the world," is very common in the Gospel of Jn, the Epistles of John, and in the other NT epistles (cf Jn 7 7; 1 Jn 2 15–17; 1 Cor 1 21; Gal 6 14; Jas 1 27). Here, too, as in the case of the power of sin in individual life, these social laws are not of themselves evil, any more than are the laws of individual development. They are social laws of God inherent in society, turned against God and man by the perversion of sin. In the Christian community, these very laws are to be a blessing to further the "kingdom of God." A Christian sociology seeks to utilize these laws for God's purpose, hence the idea of a Christian family, Christian community, Christian education, literature, art, industry, etc. It is in accord with the OT to look upon the evils of society as in some sense the sin of the individual, due to the solidarity of humanity (Dan 9 5 ff, see Achan and Accountability 3), though there is correction of a wrong use of this principle (Dt 24 16), and the assertion that the individual shall be dealt with according to his own record (Ezk 18). This principle is in accord with the tendencies of sociologists to divide and distribute responsibility between the individual and the group, and leave the individual accountable for his own character.

12. Atonement

The correct conception of sin is necessary, if we are to grasp at all the Biblical idea of how man is to be delivered. Life for man and for society is to be found in the right relation to God (Jn 17 3). Sin is a break with God, rejection of his loving purpose for the creature, wrong relation to fellow-man, opposition to the law God has given his creation, perversion of man's own powers and laws of development, involving moral and spiritual death. At best it is thoughtless content with a low moral level of self-indulgence, which has implicit at the heart of it self-deification despite God and brother man. Hence the Biblical idea that God himself must take away the guilt, and become the first mover in bringing man back into harmony with himself; hence the idea of Atonement, Justification, Redemption, which see. Hence also the Biblical idea of a burden laid on the conscience, so that only by pardon can a man get peace, and the right to forget (Rom 5 1). Indeed, the whole conception of salvation, whether as changed status before God, or as complete inner change in the sinner at the beginning, or in the continuance, of his new life, is conceived of through this conception of the actual nature and tendency of sin.

13. "In Christ"

The whole process of saving the sinner, originating in the love of God (Jn 3 16), centers in Christ. His life, particularly his death, produces atonement and Reconciliation (q.v.) of God's wrath against the sinner, and of the sinner's fear of God (Rom 5 1–11); brings the new knowledge of God to minds darkened by sin (Jn 1 18); imposes on the will the new motives that cause repentance, faith, and love (Gal 2 19, 20; Rom 5 11); supplies continuous stimuli for the new life to turn from sin (Rom 8 12 ff); and gives power and guidance through the Spirit (Rom 8 5, 26). Indeed, it is Christ living, dying, risen to live forevermore, who supplies the Spirit that by regeneration makes possible the new life in its beginning, continuance, and consummation (Mt 3 11; Acts 2 33; Rom 6 4–14). It is therefore "in Christ," that is, through being united with him, that sin is overcome in the individual (Rom 8 2; 2 Cor 5 17; Eph 2 10; Col 3 4), and from union with him results the union and fellowship of believers in the kingdom (1 Cor 10 17; 1 Jn 1 3).

14. Conversion

In the reception and experience of salvation by the individual, the nature of sin makes necessary the experience of conversion, involving repentance and faith, so much exploited by the psychology of religion. In all who reach years of discretion, it is a conscious change of the whole self, from an auto-centered to not merely a hetero-centered, but to a Christ-centered life, involving a change in material judgments, standards, affections, and attitude; all of which is very clear in all Biblical words describing this subjective change (see Convict, Repentance, Conversion, Faith). Conviction means new light on our own life in view of God's judgment; repentance means acceptance of this judgment, so that we have a "new mind" on the matter, with concern and grief; conversion means a turning away from sin, but also a turning to God; faith means reliance and trust and love. This is exactly the change of attitude of the total self which is a reversal of what sin makes a man. No doubt the degree of emotional upheaval depends on the individual's past aberration, and on the standards, socially mediated, of what is considered proper conversion; but the Biblical view considers it a conscious crisis, a break with sin. For that reason the Bible presents repentance and conversion as duty, making appeal to the whole self. The law and the gospel are recognized as instruments in conversion. The real cause is God himself (Jn 1 13), and the real object to which man turns is Christ Jesus (1 Pet 1 8; Rom 3 22).

15. Sanctification

The personal nature both of sin and salvation make necessary not only the experience of conversion but also the nature of Sanctification (q.v. specially II, 2, 3, 8). As changed status, as inner cleansing, as power and guidance through indwelling Spirit, sanctification is God's gift. As a personal experience it is possession of an ideal, and constant striving to attain a life wholly in conformity with God's will. It involves personal use of all the means of spiritual growth God has given. Christians are to grow in grace and knowledge (2 Pet 3 18), they are to continue in prayer (Rom 12 12), they are not to neglect assembling together (He 10 25); they are to walk in newness of life by the Spirit (Rom 6 4; Gal 5 16; Eph 5 2), they are to put to death the deeds of the body (Rom 8 13) cleansing themselves from all defilement of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God (2 Cor 7 1); all their gifts are to be put to the service of Christ and of the brethren, writes Paul in outlining an ideal of perfect conduct which is to be the goal of their efforts and study. He shows that the Bible presents the redeemed and saved life as the complete antithesis of sin (Rom 12 1, 2).

16. Forgiveness

Sin and its forgiveness, the recovery of the forgiven sinner and the sanctification of the new humanity in Christ Jesus is thus the supreme work of redemption. Inasmuch as God is holy and governs the world in holiness; inasmuch as He has impressed

His law upon His creation and upon the nature of man; inasmuch as He must be true to Himself in His holiness as well as in His love of man, forgiveness must not be regarded as a simple matter of overlooking the past, as it is sometimes represented. Overcoming of sin required nothing less than atonement by the gift of the Son of God; and is not accomplished until through the Spirit man becomes a new creature, with a right attitude of faith and love and obedience to God. JOHN E. KUIZENGA

SIN, sin (סִין, ṣīn, "clay or mud"; Συήνη, Suḗnē, A, Τάνις, Tánis): A city of Egypt mentioned only in Ezk 30 15.16. This seems to be a pure Sem name. The ancient Egyp name, if the place ever had one such, is unknown. Pelusium (Gr Πελούσιον, Peloúsion) also meant "the clayey or muddy town." The Pelusiac mouth of the Nile was "the muddy mouth," and the modern Arab. name of this mouth has the same significance. These facts make it practically certain that the Vulg is correct in identifying S. with Pelusium. But although Pelusium appears very frequently in ancient history, its exact location is still not entirely certain. The list of cities mentioned in Ezk in connection with S. furnishes no clue to its location. From other historical notices it seems to have been a frontier city. Rameses II built a wall from S. to Heliopolis, probably by the aid of Heb slaves (Diodorus Siculus; cf Budge, Hist of Egypt, V, 90), to protect the eastern frontier. S. was a meeting-place of Egypt with her enemies who came to attack her, many great battles being fought at or near this place. Sennacherib and Cambyses both fought Egypt near Pelusium (Herod. ii.141; iii.10–13). Antiochus IV defeated the Egyptians here (Budge, VIII, 25), and the Romans under Gabinius defeated the Egyptians in the same neighborhood. Pelusium was also accessible from the sea, or was very near a seaport, for Pompey after the disaster at Pharsalia fled into Egypt, sailing for Pelusium. These historical notices of Pelusium make its usual identification with the ruins near el-Kantara, a station on the Suez Canal 29 miles S. of Port Said, most probable. "S., the stronghold of Egypt," in the words of Ezk (30 15), would thus refer to its inaccessibility because of swamps which served as impassable moats. The wall on the S. and the sea on the N. also protected it on either flank. M. G. KYLE SINA, sī′na: In Acts 7 38 AV, RV "Sinai" (q.v.).

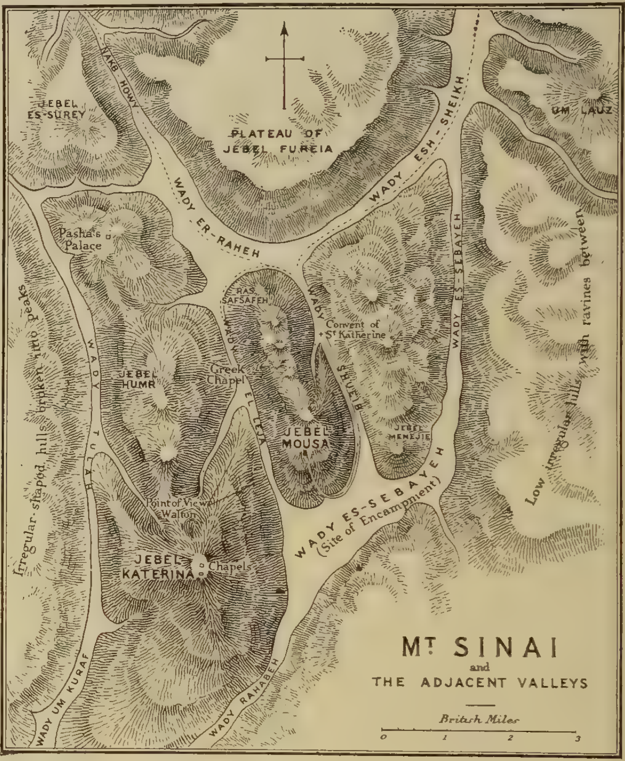
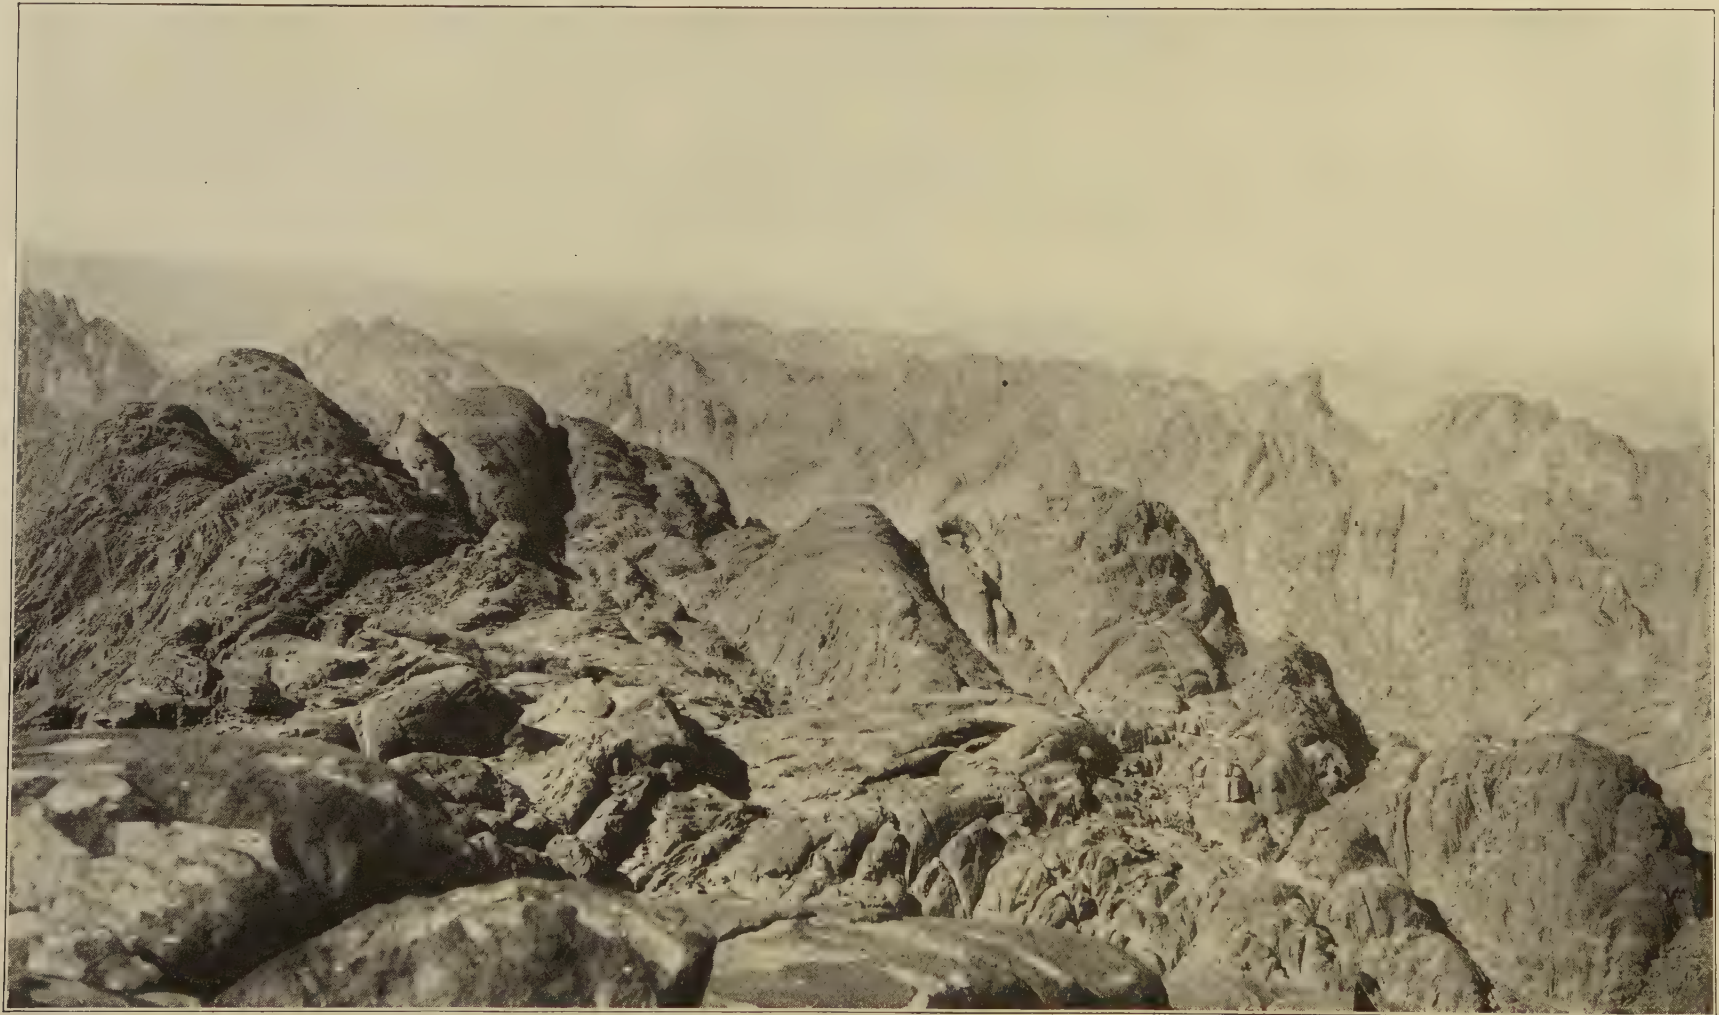
SINAI, sī′nī, sī′nā̊-ī (סִינַי, ṣīnay; A, Σινά, Siná, B, Σεινά, Seiná): The name comes probably from a root meaning "to shine," which occurs in Syr, and which in Bab is found in the name sinu for "the moon." The old explanation, "clayey," is inappropriate to any place in the Sinaitic desert, though it might apply to Sin (Ezk 30 15.16) or Pelusium; even there, however, the applicability is doubtful. The desert of Sin (Ex 16 1; 17 1; Nu 33 11 f) lay between Sinai and the Gulf of Suez, and may have been named from the "glare" of its white chalk. But at Sinai "the glory of Jeh was like devouring fire on the top of the mount in the eyes of the children of Israel" (Ex 24 17); and, indeed, the glory of the Lord still dyes the crags of Jebel Mûsa (the "mountain of Moses") with fiery red, reflected from its red granite and pink gneiss rocks, long after the shadows have fallen on the plain beneath. Sinai is mentioned, as a desert and a mountain, in 35 passages of the OT. In 17 passages the same desert and mountain are called "Horeb," or "the waste." This term is chiefly used in Dt, though Sinai also occurs (Dt 33 2). In the other books of the Pent, Sinai is the usual name, though Horeb also occurs (Ex 3 1; 17 6; 33 6), applying both to the "Mount of God" and to the desert of Rephidim, some 20 miles to the N.W.

1. The Name



The indications of position, in various passages of the Pent, favor the identification with the traditional site, which has become generally accepted by all those explorers who have carefully considered the subject, though two other theories may need notice. Moses fled to the land of Midian (or "empty land"), which lay E. of the Sinaitic peninsula

2. Traditional Site



VIEW FROM THE TOP OF MOUNT SINAI

(Nu 22 4.7; 25, 31), and when he wandered with his flocks to Horeb (Ex 3 1) he is said to have reached the west side of the desert. In another note (Dt 1 2) we read that the distance was "eleven days' journey from Horeb by the way of Mount Seir unto Kadesh-barnea" or Petra (see WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL), the distance being about 145 miles, or 14 miles of daily march, though Israel—with its flocks, women and children—made 16 marches between these points. Sinai again is described as being distant from Egypt "three days' journey into the wilderness" (Ex 5 3), the actual route being 117 miles, which Israel accomplished in 10 journeys. But, for Arabs not encumbered with families and herds, this distance could still be covered by an average march of 39 miles daily, on riding camels, or even, if necessary, on foot.

Râs-es-Ṣafṣâfeh.

3. Identification with Jebel Mûsa

These distances will not, however, allow of our placing Sinai farther E. than Jebel Mûsa. Lofty mountains, in all parts of the world, have always been sacred and regarded as the mysterious abode of God; and Jos says that Sinai is "the highest of all the mountains thereabout," and again is "the highest of all the mountains that are in that country, and is not only very difficult to be ascended by men, on account of its vast altitude, but because of the sharpness of its precipices: nay, indeed, it cannot be looked at without pain of the eyes, and besides this it was terrible and inaccessible, on account of the rumor that passed about, that God dwelt there" (Ant, II, xii, 1; III, v, 1). Evidently in his time Sinai was supposed to be one of the peaks of the great granitic block called et Ṭûr—a term applying to any lofty mountain. This block has its highest peak in Jebel Kâtarîn (so named from a legend of St. Catherine of Egypt), rising 8,550 ft. above the sea. N.E. of this is Jebel Mûsa (7,370 ft.), which, though less high, is more conspicuous because of the open plain called er Râḥah ("the wide") to its N.W. This plain is about 4 miles long and has a width of over a mile, so that it forms, as Dr. E. Robinson (Bib. Res., 1838, I, 89) seems to have been the first to note, a natural camp at the foot of the mountain, large enough for the probable numbers (see EXODUS, 3) of Israel.

Jebel Mûsa has two main tops, that to the S.E. being crowned by a chapel. The other, divided by gorges into three precipitous crags, has the Convent to its N., and is called Râs-es-Ṣafṣâfeh, or "the willow top." N. of the Convent is the lower top of Jebel ed Deir ("mountain of the monastery").

4. Description of Jebel Mûsa

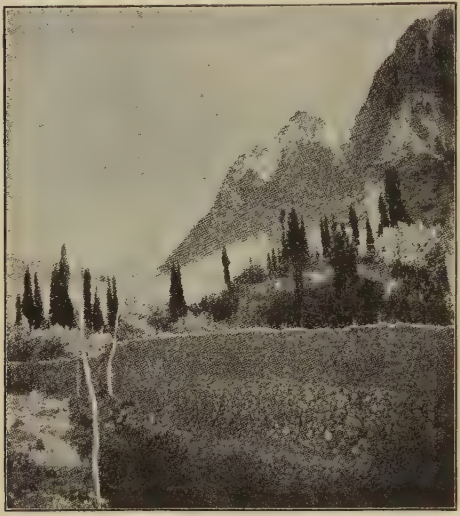
These heights were accurately determined by Royal Engineer surveyors in 1868 (Sir C. Wilson, Ordnance Survey of Sinai); and, though it is impossible to say which of the peaks Moses ascended, yet they are all much higher than any mountains in the Sinaitic desert, or in Midian. The highest tops in the Tîh desert to the N. are not much over 4,000 ft. Those in Midian, E. of Elath, rise only to 4,200 ft. Even Jebel Serbâl, 20 miles W. of Sinai—a ridge with many crags, running 3 miles in length—is at its highest only 6,730 ft. above the sea. Horeb is not recorded to have been visited by any of the Hebrews after Moses, excepting by Elijah (1 K 19 8) in a time of storm. In favor of the traditional site it may also be observed that clouds suddenly formed, or lasting for days (Ex 24 15 f), are apt to cap very lofty mountains. The Hebrews reached Sinai about the end of May (Ex 19 1) and, on the 3d day, "there were thunders and lightnings, and a thick cloud upon the mount" (ver 16). Such storms occur as a rule in the Sinaitic desert only in December and January, but thunderstorms are not unknown in Pal even in May.

5. Patristic Evidence A constant tradition fixing the site is traceable back to the 4th cent. AD. Eusebius and Jerome (Onom, s.v. "Choreb") place Horeb near Paran, which in their time was placed (Onom, s.v. "Raphidim") in Wâdy Feirân. Anchorites lived at Paran, and at Sinai at least as early as 365 AD, and are noticed in 373 AD, and often later (Robinson, Bib. Res., 1838, I, 122–28); the monastery was first built for them by Justinian in 527 AD and his chapel still exists. Cosmas (Topogr. Christ.), in the same reign, says that Rephidim was then called Pharan, and (distinguishing Horeb from Sinai, as Eusebius also does) he places it "about 6 miles from Pharan," and "near Sinai." These various considerations may suffice to show that the tradition as to Horeb is at least as old as the time of Jos, and that it agrees with all the indications given in the OT.



Convent Garden, Sinai.

6. Lepsius' Theory Lepsius, it is true (Letters from Egypt, 1842–44), denying the existence of any unbroken tradition, and relying on his understanding of Cosmas, supposed Sinai to be the Jebel Serbâl above mentioned, which lies immediately S. of Wâdy Feirân. His main argument was that, visiting Sinai in March, he considered that the vicinity did not present sufficient water for Israel (Appendix B, 303–18). But, on this point, it is sufficient to give the opinion of the late Rev. F. W. Holland, based on the experience of four visits, in 1861, 1865, 1867–68.

He says (Recovery of Jerus, 524):

> "With regard to water-supply there is no other spot in the whole Peninsula which is nearly so well supplied as the neighborhood of Jebel Mûsa. Four streams of running water are found there: one in Wâdy Leja; a second in Wâdy et Ṭl'ah which waters a succession of gardens extending more than 3 miles in length, and forms pools in which I have often had a swim; a third stream rises to the N. of the watershed of the plain of er Râḥah and runs W. into Wâdy et Ṭl'ah; and a fourth is formed by the drainage from the mountains of Umm 'Alawy, to the E. of Wâdy Sebaiyeh and finds its way into that valley by a narrow ravine opposite Jebel ed Deir. In addition to these streams there are numerous wells and springs, affording excellent water throughout the whole of the granitic district. I have seldom found it necessary to carry water when making a mountain excursion, and the intermediate neighborhood of Jebel Mûsa would, I think, bear comparison with many mountain districts in Scotland with regard to its supply of water. There is also no other district in the Peninsula which affords such excellent pasturage."

This is important, as Israel encamped near Sinai from the end of May till April of the next year. There is also a well on the lower slope of Jebel Mûsa itself, where the ascent begins.

7. Greene's Theory Another theory, put forward by Mr. Baker Greene (The Heb Migration from Egypt), though accepted by Dr. Sayce (Higher Cricitism, 1894, 268), appears likewise to be entirely untenable. Mr. Greene supposed Elim (Ex 15 27) to be Elath (Dt 2 8), now 'Ailah at the head of the Gulf of 'Akâbah; and that Sinai therefore was some unknown mountain in Midian. But in this case Israel would in 4 days (see Ex 15 22.23.27) have traveled a distance of 200 miles to reach Elim, which cannot but be regarded as quite impossible for the Hebrews when accompanied by women, children, flocks and herds.

SINCERE, sin-sēr′, SINCERITY, sin-ser′i-ti (תָּמִים, tāmīm; ἀφθαρσία, aphtharsía, εἰλικρίνεια, eilikríneia): "Sincerity" occurs once in the OT as the tr of tāmīm, "complete," "entire," "sincere," etc (Josh 24 14); the same word is tr^{d} "sincerity" (Jgs 9 16.19, RV "uprightly"). Four different words are rendered "sincere," "sincerely," "sincerity," in the NT: ádolos, "without guile," "unadulterated," "desire the sincere milk of the word" (1 Pet 2 2 AV, RV "the spiritual," ARVm "Gr, 'belonging to the reason'; cf Rom 12 1," ERVm "reasonable"), "milk which is without guile," with no other purpose but to nourish and benefit the soul (Alford); hagnós, "without blame," "pure," "preach Christ . . . . not sincerely" (Phil 1 17); aphtharsia, "without corruption" (Eph 6 24, AV "that love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity," ARV "with a love incorruptible," m " 'in incorruption.' See Rom 2 7," ERV "uncorruptness"; Tit 2 7, AV "shewing uncorruptness . . . . sincerity," RV "uncorruptness"); gnḗsios, "not spurious" (2 Cor 8 8); eilikrinḗs, lit., judged of in the sunlight, hence, "clear," "manifest" (Phil 1 10); eilikrineia, with same meaning, is tr^{d} "sincerity" (1 Cor 5 8; 2 Cor 1 12; 2 17).

RV has "sincere" for "pure" (2 Pet 3 1), "sincerely" for "clearly" (Job 33 3).

In Wisd 7 25 we have eilikrinēs in the description of Wisdom as a "pure influence," RV "clear effluence."

SINEW, sin′ū (גִּיד, gīdh [Job 10 11, etc]): The tendons and sinews of the body are uniformly (7 t) thus called. "Therefore the children of Israel eat not the sinew of the hip which is upon the hollow of the thigh, unto this day: because he touched the hollow of Jacob's thigh in the sinew of the hip" (Gen 32 32). In the poetical description of Behemoth (hippopotamus) it is said: "He moveth his tail like a cedar: the sinews of his thighs are knit together" (Job 40 17). The prophet Ezekiel saw in his vision (37 6.8) that the dry bones were gathered together, that they were covered with sinews, flesh and skin, and that they were revived by the spirit of the Lord. In figurative language the neck of the obstinate is compared to an "iron sinew" (Isa 48 4). AV "my sinews take no rest" (w^{e}'ōr^{e}ḳay lō' yishkābhūn, Job 30 17) has been corrected by RV into "the pains that gnaw me take no rest," but the earlier version has been retained in the margin.

SINGERS, sing′ẽrz, SINGING, sing′ing: Singing seems to have become a regular profession at a quite early date among the Hebrews. David had his troupe of "singing men and singing women" at Jerus (2 S 19 35), and no doubt Solomon added to their numbers. Isa 23 16 suggests that it was not uncommon for foreign female minstrels of questionable character to be heard making "sweet melody," singing songs along the streets and highways of Judaea. Nor was the worship of the temple left to the usually incompetent and inconstant leadership of amateur choristers. The elaborate regulations drawn up for the constitution of the temple orchestra and chorus are referred to under MUSIC (q.v.). It has been inferred from Ezr 2 65 that women were included among the temple singers, but this is erroneous, as the musicians there mentioned were of the class employed at banquets, festivals, etc. The temple choir consisted exclusively of Levites, one essential qualification of an active member of that order being a good voice.

Of the vocal method of the Hebrews we know nothing. Wellhausen imagines that he can detect one of the singers, in the portrayal of an Assyr band, compressing his throat in order to produce a vibrato; and it is quite possible that in other respects as well as this, ancient and modern oriental vocalization resembled each other. But that is about all that can be said.

On the other hand, we cannot repeat too often that we are quite unable to identify any intervals, scales, or tunes as having been used in ancient Israel. Even those who hold that the early church took the Gregorian "tones" from the synagogue, confess that it was "certainly not without considerable modifications." And, of course, there was not the slightest affinity between the Heb and the Anglican chant. See MUSIC; PRAISE; SONG; TEMPLE.

SINGLE, sin'g'l, EYE: Mt 6 22 f ‖ Lk 11 34: "If therefore thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light. But if thine eye be evil, thy whole body shall be full of darkness." "Single" and "evil" here represent ἁπλοῦς, haploús, and πονηρός, ponērós. Ponēros elsewhere in the NT means "wicked"; haplous occurs only here in the NT, but is very common in ordinary Gr and always has the meaning "simple." But in view of the context, most commentators take haplous here as meaning "normal," "healthy," and ponēros as "diseased," so rendering "Just as physical enlightenment depends on the condition of the eye, so does spiritual enlightenment depend on the condition of the heart." This is natural enough, but it is not satisfactory, as it gives to haplous a unique sense and to ponēros a sense unique in the 73 NT examples of the word. Moreover, the same expression, "evil eye," is found also in Mt 20 15; Mk 7 22, where it means "jealousy" or "covetousness." With ponēros="covetous," haplous would="generous"; and this rendition gives excellent sense in Mt, where the further context deals with love of money. Yet in Lk it is meaningless, where the context is of a different sort, a fact perhaps indicating that Lk has placed the saying in a bad context. Or the Gr tr of Christ's words used by Matthew and Luke may have taken the moral terms haplous and ponēros to translate physical terms ("healthy" and "diseased"?) employed in the original Aramaic. The Sinaitic Syr version of Lk 11 36 may perhaps contain a trace of an older rendering. See Jülicher, Die Gleichnisreden Jesu, II, 98–108.

BURTON SCOTT EASTON

SINGULAR, sin'gū-lar: "Pertaining to the single person," "individual," and so sometimes "unusual," "remarkable." So Wisd 14 18, AV "the singular diligence of the artificer" (φιλοτιμία, philotimía, "love of honor," RV "ambition"). In Lev 27 2 by "when a man shall make a singular vow" AV seems to have understood a "personal" or "private" vow. RV has "accomplish a vow," with m "make a special vow." Cf the same phrase (yaphlī' [yephallē'] nedher) used of the Nazirite vow in Nu 6 2.

SINIM, sī'nim, sin'im, LAND OF (אֶרֶץ סִינִים, 'ereç ṣīnīm; γῆ Περσῶν, gē Persôn): The name occurs in Isaiah's prophecy of the return of the people from distant lands: "Lo, these shall come from far; and, lo, these from the north and from the west; and these from the land of Sinim" (49 12). The land is clearly far off, and it must be sought either in the S. or in the E. LXX points to an eastern country. Many scholars have favored identification with China, the classical Sinae. It seems improbable that Jews had already found their way to China; but from very early times trade relations were established with the Far East by way of Arabia and the Pers Gulf; and the name may have been used by the prophet simply as suggesting extreme remoteness. Against this view are Dillmann (Comm. on Isa), Duhm, Cheyne and others. Some have suggested places in the S.: e.g. Sin (Pelusium, Ezk 30 15) and Syene (Cheyne, Intro to Isa, 275). But these seem to be too near. In harmony with his reconstruction of Bib. history, Cheyne finally concludes that the reference here is to the return from a captivity in North Arabia (EB, s.v.). While no certain decision is possible, probability points to the E., and China cannot be quite ruled out. See art. "China," Enc Brit^{11}, 188*b*.

W. EWING

SINITES, sī'nīts (סִינִי, ṣīnī): A Canaanite people mentioned in Gen 10 17; 1 Ch 1 15. The identification is uncertain. Jerome mentions a ruined city Ṣin, near Arka, at the foot of Lebanon.

SINLESSNESS, sin'les-nes: The 15th Anglican article ("Of Christ Alone without Sin") may be quoted as a true summary of Scripture teaching on sinlessness: "Christ in the truth of our nature was made like unto us in all things, sin only excepted, from which He was clearly [prorsus] void, both in His flesh and in His spirit. . . . . Sin, as Saint John saith, was not in Him. But all we the rest, though baptized, and born again in Christ, yet offend in many things; and, if we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves."

1. Christ Sinless

Here the sinlessness of the Incarnate Son is affirmed. It needs no elaborate argument to show that this is the affirmation of Scripture. It is not only, as we are reminded above, definitely taught there. Yet more is it implied in the mysterious (and morally miraculous) phenomenon of the Lord's evidently total immunity from the sense of sin, His freedom from inward discord or imperfection, from the slightest discontent with self. It is not too much to say that this representation is self-evidential of its truth to fact. Had it been the invention of worshipping disciples, we may say with confidence that they (supposed thus capable of "free handling") would have been certain to betray some moral aberrations in their portraiture of their Master. They must have failed to put before us the profound ethical paradox of a person who, on the one hand, enjoins penitence and (with a tenderness infinitely deep) loves the penitent, and, on the other hand, is never for a moment penitent Himself, and who all the while has proved, from the first, a supreme moral and spiritual magnet, "drawing all men to him." Meanwhile the Scripture represents the sinlessness of the Incarnate Lord as no mere automatic or effortless condition. He is sensitive to temptation, to a degree which makes it agony. His sinlessness, as to actual experience (we are not here considering the matter sub specie aeternitatis), lies in the perfect fidelity to the Father of a will, exercised under human conditions, filled absolutely with the Holy Spirit, willingly received.

On the other hand, "we the rest," contemplated as true believers, are warned by the general teaching of Scripture never to affirm sinlessness as our condition.

2. Saints Not Sinless

There are passages (e.g. 1 Jn 3 9; 5 1 f) which affirm of the regenerate man that he "sinneth not." But it seems obvious to remark that such words, taken without context and balance, would prove too much; they would make the smallest sense of sin a tremendous evidence against the person's regeneration at all. It would seem that such words practically mean that sin and the regenerate character are diametrical opposites, so that sinning is out of character, not in the man as such, but in the Christian as such. And the practical result is an unconquerable aversion and opposition in the regenerate will toward all known sin, and a readiness as sensitive as possible for confession of failure. Meanwhile such passages as 1 Jn are, to the unbiased reader, an urgent warning of the peril of affirming our perfect purity of will and character. But then, on the other hand, Scripture abounds in both precepts and promises bearing on the fact that in Christ and by the power of His Spirit, received by faith into a watchful soul, our weakness can be so lifted and transformed that a moral purification and emancipation is possible for the weakest Christian which, compared with the best efforts of unregenerate nature, is a "more than conquest" over evil (see e.g. 2 Cor 12 9.10; Gal 2 20; Eph 6 16; Jude ver 24). See further FLESH; SPIRIT.

HANDLEY DUNELM

SINNER, sin′ẽr (חַטָּא, ḥaṭṭā'; ἁμαρτωλός, hamartōlós, "devoted to sin," "erring one"): In the NT, in addition to its ordinary significance of one that sins (Lk 5 8; 13 2; Rom 5 8.19; 1 Tim 1 15; He 7 26), the term is applied to those who lived in disregard of ceremonial prescription (Mt 9 10.11; Mk 2 15 ff; Lk 5 30; Gal 2 15); to those stained with certain definite vices or crimes, as the publicans (Lk 15 2; 18 13; 19 7); to the heathen (Mt 26 45; Gal 2 15; cf Tob 13 6; 1 Macc 1 34; 2 Macc 2 48. 62); to the preëminently sinful (Mk 8 38; Jn 9 24. 31; Gal 2 17; 1 Tim 1 9; Jude ver 15). It was the Jewish term for a woman of ill-fame (Lk 7 37; cf Mt 21 32, where it is stated that such had come even to John's baptism also). For the general Bib. conception of the term, see SIN. M. O. EVANS

SION, sī′un (שִׂיאֹן, sī'ōn; Σηών, Sēṓn):

(1) A name given to Mt. Hermon in Dt 4 48. The name may mean "protuberance" or "peak," and may have denoted the lofty snow-covered horn of the mountain as seen from the S. It may, however, be a scribal error for Sirion, the name by which the mountain was known to the Zidonians. Syr takes it in this sense, which, however, may be a correction of the Heb. It is possible that this name, like Senir, may have applied to some distinct part of the Hermon Range.

(2) Mt. Sion; see ZION.

SIPHMOTH, sif′moth, sif′mōth (שִׂפְמוֹת, siphmōth [Ginsburg], שִׂפֲמוֹת, shiphămōth [Baer]; Σαφεί, Sapheí): One of the cities to which David sent presents from Ziklag (1 S 30 28). It occurs between Aroer and Eshtemoa, so it must have been somewhere in Southern Judah. The site has not been recovered. Zabdi the Shiphmite (1 Ch 27 27) may quite probably have been a native of this place.

SIPPAI, sip′ī, si-pā′ī. See SAPH.

SIR, sûr: In the OT this word in Gen 43 20 AV ('ādhōn) is changed in RV into "my lord." In the NT the word sometimes represents ἀνήρ, anḗr, as in Acts 7 26; 14 15; 19 25, etc; more frequently κύριος, kúrios, "lord," as in Mt 13 27; 21 30; 27 36; Jn 4 11.15.19.49 (RVm "lord"); 20 15. In Rev 7 14, RV renders "my lord."

LITERATURE

Sirach is the largest and most comprehensive example of Wisdom Literature (see WISDOM LITERATURE), and it has also the distinction of being the oldest book in the Apoc, being indeed older than at least two books (Dnl, Est) which have found a place in the Canon alike of the Eastern and Western churches.

I. Name.—The Heb copy of the book which Jerome knew bore, according to his explicit testimony (see his preface to his version of Libri Sol.), the same title as the canonical Prov, i.e. מְשָׁלִים, mᵉshālīm, "Proverbs" (Parabolae is Jerome's word). It is quoted in rabbinical lit. by the sing. of this name, מָשָׁל, māshāl=Aram. מַתְלָא, mathlā', but in the Talm it is cited by the author's name, "Ben Sira" (בֶּן סִירָא, ben ṣīrā'). The Heb fragments found in recent years have no title attached to them. In the Gr MSS the heading is Σοφία 'Ιησοῦ υἱοῦ Σιράχ (or Σειράχ), Sophía Iēsoú huioú Sirách (Seirách), "The Wisdom of Jesus, son of Sirach" (so ℵ A); or simply Σοφία Σειράχ, Sophía Seirách (B), "The Wisdom of Sirach." The Fathers called it either (as Euseb., etc) ἡ πανάρετος σοφία, hē panáretos sophía, "the all virtuous wisdom," or simply ἡ πανάρετος, hē panáretos, "the all virtuous (one)," or (Clement of Alex.) παιδαγωγός, paidagōgós, "teacher." The first Heb and the several Gr titles describe the subject-matter, one Heb title (ben ṣīrā') the author. But the Lat name Ecclesiasticus was given the book because it was one of the books allowed to be read in the Ecclesia, or church, for edification (libri ecclesiastici), though not one of the books of the Canon (libri canonici) which could be quoted in proof or disproof of doctrine. The present book is called Ecclesiasticus by way of preëminence since the time of Cyprian (Testimon. 2, etc). The Syr (Pesh) title as given in the London Polyglot is "The Book of Jesus the son of Simon 'Āṣīrā' [אָסִירָא], called also the Book of the Wisdom of Bar [=Heb ben, "son of"] 'Āṣīrā'." There can be no doubt that Asira (sometimes tr^{d} "bound") is but a corrupted form of Sira. For other explanations see Ryssel in Kautzsch, AT Apoc, 234.

Lagarde in his corrected text prefixes the title, "The Wisdom of Bar [=Heb ben, "son of"] Sira." How is it that the Heb סירא, sīrā', has in the Gr become Sirach (or Seirach)? How are we to explain the final ch in the Gr? The present writer thinks it is due to an attempt to represent in writing the guttural sound of the final letter 'aleph in the Heb name as in the Gr Ἀκελδαμάχ, Akeldamách, for the Aram. חֲקַל דְּמָא, ḥăkal d^{e}mā' (Acts 1 19). Dalman, however (Aram. Gramm., 161, n. 6), followed by Ryssel, holds that the final ch is simply a sign that the word is indeclinable; cf Ἰωσήχ, Iōsêch (Lk 3 26), for Heb יוֹסֵי, yōṣē.

II. Canonicity.—Though older than both Dnl and Est, this book was never admitted into the Jewish Canon. There are numerous quotations from it, however, in Talmudic and rabbinic lit. (see a list in Zunz, Die Gottesdienstlichen Vorträge^{2}, 101 f; Delitzsch, Zur Geschichte der jüd. Poësie, 204 f; Schechter, JQR, III, 682–706; Cowley and Neubauer, The Original Heb of a Portion of Ecclus, xix–xxx). It is not referred to explicitly in Scripture, yet it is always cited by Jewish and Christian writers with respect and perhaps sometimes as Scripture. It forms a part of the Vulg of the Tridentine Council and therefore of the Romanist Canon, but the Protestant churches have never recognized it as canonical, though the bulk of modern Protestant scholars set a much higher value upon it than they do upon many books in the Protestant Canon (Ch, Est, etc). It was accepted as of canonical rank by Augustine and by the Councils of Hippo (393) and Carthage (397, 419), yet it is omitted from the lists of accepted books given by Melito (c 180 AD), Origen, in the Apost. Canons and in the list of the Councils of Laodicea (341 and 381). Jerome writes in Libri Sol.: "Let the church read these two books [Wisd and Sir] for the instruction of the people, not for establishing the authority of the dogmas of the church." It suffered in the respect of many because it was not usually connected with a great name; cf the so-called "Proverbs of Solomon." Sir is cited or referred to frequently in the Ep. of Jas (Jas 1 2–4—cf Sir 2 1–5; Jas 1 5—cf Sir 1 26; 41 22; 51 13 f; Jas 1 8 ["double minded"]—cf Sir 1 28, etc). The book is often cited in the works of the Fathers (Clem. Alex., Origen, Augustine, etc) and also in the Apos Const with the formula that introduces Scripture passages: "The Scripture says," etc. The Reformers valued Sir highly, and parts of it have been incorporated into the Anglican Prayer-book.

III. Contents.—It is quite impossible in the book as it stands to trace any one scheme of thought, for the author's mind moves lightly from topic to topic, recurring frequently to the same theme and repeating not seldom the same idea. It is, however, too much to say with Sonntag (De Jesu Siracidae, etc) that the book is a farrago of sayings with no connection, or with Berthold that the "work is but a rhapsody," for the whole is informed and controlled by one master thought, the supreme value to everyone of Wisdom. By this last the writer means the Jewish religion as conceived by enlightened Jews toward the beginning of the 2d cent. BC, and as reflected in the Law of Moses (see 24 23–34), and in a less degree in the books of the Prophets and in the other writings (see Prologue). The book follows the lines of the canonical Book of Prov, and is made up of short pithy sayings with occasional longer discussions, largely collected but in part composed, and all informed and governed by the dominant note of the book: true Wisdom, the chief end of man. Most of the book is poetical in form, and even in the prose parts the parallelism of Heb poetry is found. Many unsuccessful attempts have been made to trace a definite continuous line of reasoning in the book, but the vital differences in the schemes propounded suggest what an examination of the book itself confirms, that the compiler and author put his materials together with little or no regard to logical connection, though he never loses sight of his main theme—Wisdom the chief thing.

Eichhorn (Einleitung, 50 ff) divides the book into three parts (chs 1–23; 24—42 14; 42 15—50 24), and maintains that at first each of these was a separate work, united subsequently by the author. Julian divides the work into three, Scholz into twelve, Fritzsche (Einleitung, xxxii) and Ryssel (op. cit., 240) into seven, Edersheim (op. cit., 19 f) and R. G. Moulton (Modern Reader's Bible: Ecclus, xvi ff) into five portions, and many other arrangements have been proposed and defended as by Ewald, Holzmann, Bissell, Zöckler, etc. That there are small independent sections, essayettes, poems, etc, was seen by the early scribes to whom the LXX in its present form was largely due, for they have prefixed headings to the sections beginning with the following verses: 18 30 ("Temperance of Soul"); 20 27 ("Proverbs"); 23 7 ("Discipline of the Mouth"); 24 1 ("The Praise of Wisdom"); 30 1 ("Concerning Children"); 30 14 ("Concerning Health"); 30 16 ("Concerning Foods"; this is absent from many MSS, though retained by Swete who, however, omits the preceding heading); 30 24 (EV 33 24, "Concerning Servants"); 35 (EV 32 1, "Concerning Rulers"); 44 1 ("Praise of the Fathers"); 51 1 ("The Prayer of Jesus, Son of Sirach"). Probably the whole book possessed such headings at one time, and it is quite possible that they originated in the need to guide readers after the book had become one of the chief church reading-books (so W. J. Deane in Expos, II, vi, 327). These headings are given in Eng. in AV proper (in the margin), though in modern reprints, as also in RV, they are unfortunately omitted. The whole book has been arranged in headed sections by H. J. Holzmann (Bunsen's Bibelwerk, IX, 392 ff) and by R. G. Moulton (op. cit.).

IV. Teaching.—In general it may be said that the principles enunciated in this book agree with those of the Wisdom school of Palestinian Judaism about 200 BC, though there is not a word in the book about a Messianic hope or the setting up of a Messianic kingdom. None of the views characteristic of Alexandrian Judaism and absent from the teaching of Palestinian Judaism are to be found in this book, though some of them at least are represented in Wisd (see WISDOM OF SOLOMON, VI; TEACHING). Gfrörer (Milo und die jüd.-alex. Philo., II, 18 ff) and Dähne (Gesch. der jüd.-alex. rel. Phil., II, 141 ff) hold that the book contains many Alexandrian expressions and numerous statements peculiar to the Alexandrian philosophy. But apart from some late interpolations, mostly Christian, what these Ger. scholars say is untrue, as Drummond (Philo Judaeus, I, 144 ff), Deane (Expos, II, v, 334 ff) and others have shown. The outstanding features of Alexandrianism are the allegorical interpretation of the Scriptures, its conception of the ecstatic vision of God, its doctrine of mediating powers between man and God and its adoption of purely Gr ideas. None of these can be traced in Sir. The Hebrews never developed a theoretical or speculative theology or philosophy: all their thinking gathered about life and conduct; the duties that men owed to God and to one another; the hopes that they cherished and the fears by which they were animated. This is the only philosophy which the Bible and the so-called Apoc teach, and it is seen at its highest point in the so-called WISDOM LITERATURE (q.v.). The main lines of the teaching of Sir may be set out as follows, under the three heads of religion, morals, and manners.

1. Religion

(1) God.—The view of God given in this book agrees generally with that put forth by the later writers of the OT from the exile (Second Isa, Job, etc) onward, though the God of this book lacks the love and tenderness of the Jeh of the OT prophets. God is present everywhere (16 17–23); He created the world as an ordered whole (16 26–30) and made man intelligent and supreme over all flesh. The expressions used are no doubt modeled on Gen 1, and it may fairly be inferred that creation out of nothing is meant. Wisd, on the other hand, teaches the Alexandrian doctrine that matter (ὕλη, húlē) is eternal and that the Creator's work consisted of fashioning, adapting and beautifying. The world is a creature of God, not (as in Philo, etc)

an emanation from Him. Yet is He compassionate and forgiving (17 24 ff). His works are past finding out (18 2 ff); but His compassion is upon all flesh (18 13), i.e. upon all that accept His chastening and seek to do His will (18 14). In 43 27 God is said to be "the all" (τὸ πâν, tó pán), which simply means that He pervades and is the ground of everything. It is not Alexandrian pantheism that is taught. Gfrörer and others take a contrary view.

(2) Revelation.—In harmony with other products of the "Wise Men," Sir sets chief value upon natural religion, that revealed in the instincts, reason and conscience of man as well as by the sun, moon, stars, etc. Yet Sir gives far more prominence than Prov to the idea that the Divine Will is specially made known in the Law of Moses (24 23; 45 1–4). We do not meet once with the word "law" in Eccl, nor law in the technical sense (Law of Moses) in either Job, Wisd or Prov. In the last-named it is simply one of many synonyms denoting "Wisdom." In Sir the word occurs over 20 t, not, however, always, even when the expression "Law of Moses" is used, in the sense of the "five books" (Pent). It generally includes in its connotation also "the prophecies and the rest of the books" (Prologue); see 32 (LXX 35) 24; 33 (LXX 36) 1–3.

(3) Sin.—Sin is due to the wrong exercise of man's free will. Men can, if they like, keep the commandments, and when they break from them they are themselves alone to be blamed (15 14–17). Yet it was through a woman (Eve) that sin entered the world and death by sin (25 24; cf 1 Tim 2 14). See Rom 5 12 where "one man," strictly "human being" (ver 14, "Adam"), is made the first cause of sin. But nowhere in Sir is the doctrine of original sin taught.

(4) Predestination.—Notwithstanding the prominence given to "free will" (see [3], above), Sir teaches the doctrine of predestination, for God has determined that some men should be high and some low, some blessed and others cursed (33 10 ff).

(5) Satan.—The word "Satan" (Σατανâς, Satanás) in 21 27 (it occurs nowhere else in the Apoc) denotes one's own wicked heart, as the parallelism shows.

(6) Salvation.—There is no salvation except by way of good works on man's part (14 16 f) and forgiveness on God's (17 24–32). The only atonement is through one's own good works (5 5 f), honoring parents (32 14 f), almsgiving, etc (3 30; 17 19 ff). There is no objective atonement ("expiation," lit. "propitiation"; the Gr vb. ἐξιλάσκομαι, exiláskomai, is the great LXX word for the Heb כִּפֶּר, kipper, "to atone").

(7) Sacrifice.—The sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to God (34 18 ff), though He Himself appointed sacrifices and first-fruits (45 20 f), and when the righteous offer sacrifices to God they are accepted and remembered in the time to come (35 1–12).

(8) Feasts.—Festivals as well as seasons are ordained by God to be observed by man (33 [LXX 36] 8 f; cf Gen 1 14).

(9) Prayer.—The duty of prayer is often pointed out (37 15, etc), the necessary preparation defined (17 25; 18 20.23), and its successful issue promised (35 17). There must be no vain repetitions (7 14; cf Mt 6 7), nor should there be any faintheartedness in the matter (5 10; cf Jas 1 6). Men are to pray in sickness (38 9), but all the same the physician should be consulted and his advice followed (38 1 f.12 ff).

(10) Angelology.—Sir nowhere clearly expresses his belief in angels or uses language which implies such a belief. For "an angel [ὁ ἄγγελος, ho ággelos] destroyed them" the Heb of the original passage (2 K 19 35) has מַגֵּפָה, maggēphāh, "plague," and so the Syr, though the LXX (followed by the Vulg) has "angel."

(11) Eschatology.—Nowhere in this book is the doctrine of a future life taught, and the whole teaching of the book leaves no place for such a doctrine. Men will be indeed rewarded or punished according to their conduct, but in this world (see 2 10 f; 9 12; 11 26 f). The retribution is, however, not confined to the individuals in their lifetime; it extends to their children and involves their own glorious or inglorious name after death (see 11 28; 40 15; 41 6; 44 11–13). The passage concerning Gehenna (7 17) is undoubtedly spurious and is lacking in the Syr, Ethiopic, etc. Since the book is silent as to a future life, it is of necessity silent on the question of a resurrection. Nothing is hinted as to a life beyond the grave, even in 41 1–4, where the author deprecates the fear of death. In these matters Sir agrees with the Pent and the prophetic and poetical books of the OT (Pss, Job, etc), none of which give any intimation of a life beyond the grave. Little or nothing is said of the Messianic hope which must have been entertained largely by Palestinian Jews living in the author's time, though in 36 (LXX 33) 1–17 the writer prays for the restoration of Israel and Jerus, i.e. R. H. Charles thinks (Eschatology, etc, 65), for the bringing in of the Messianic kingdom.

(12) Sirach's doctrine of Wisdom.—For a general discussion of the rise and development of the conception of Wisdom in the OT and in the Apoc see Wisdom Literature. A brief statement as to what the word implies in Sir is all that can here be attempted. It is in chs 1 and 24 that Ben Sira's doctrine is chiefly contained.

Wisdom is from God: He created it and it must therefore have a separate existence. Yet it is dependent on Him. It is omnipresent, though it dwells in a peculiar sense with all flesh. The root and beginning of Wisdom, its fulness and crown, are the fear of God (1 14.16.18.21); so that only the obedient and pious possess it (1 10.26); indeed Wisdom is identified with the fear of the Lord and the observance of the Law (19 20); it is even made one with the Law of Moses (24 23), i.e. it consists of practical principles, of precepts regulating the life. In this doctrine we have a combination of universalism, principles of reason and Jewish particularism as the teaching of the revealed Law. We have the first in 24 3–21; the second in 24 23–34. Have we in this chapter, as in Prov, nothing outside the teaching of Palestinian Judaism? Gfrörer (op. cit., II, 18 ff) denies this, maintaining that the whole of ch 24 was written by an Alexandrian Jew and adopted unchanged by Ben Sira. But what is there in this chapter which an orthodox, well-informed Palestinian Jew of Ben Sira's time might not well have written? It is quite another question whether this whole conception of Wisdom in the so-called Wisdom books is not due, in some measure, to Gr, though not Alexandrian, influence, unless indeed the Gr influence came by way of Alexandria. In the philosophy of Socrates, and in a less exclusive sense in that of Plato and Aristotle, the good man is the wise one. Cheyne (Job and Sol, 190) goes probably too far when he says, "By Gr philosophy Sirach, as far as we can see, was wholly uninfluenced."

2. Morals

The ethical principle of Sir is Hedonism or individual utilitarianism, as is that of Prov and the OT generally, though in the Pss and in the prophetical writings gratitude to God for the love He has shown and the kind acts He has performed is the basis of endless appeals and vows. Moreover, the individual point of view is reached only in the late parts of the OT. In the older OT books, as in Plato, etc, it is the state that constitutes the unit, not the individual human being. The rewards and penalties of conduct, good and bad, belong to this present world. See what is said in (11) "Eschatology," above; see also 2 7 f; 11 17; 16 6 f; 40 13 f, etc.

The hedonistic principle is carried so far that we are urged to help the good because they are most likely to prove serviceable to us (12 2); to aid our fellow-man in distress, so that in his days of prosperity he may be our friend (22 23); contrast the teaching of Jesus Christ (Lk 6 30–36). Friends are to be bemoaned for appearance' sake (38 17). Yet many of the precepts are lofty. We are exhorted to show kindness and forbearance to the poor and to give help to our fellow-man (29 8.20); to give alms (12 3); speak kindly (18 15–18); masters should treat servants as brethren, nay as they would themselves be treated (7 20–22; 33 30 f); parents should give heed to the proper training of their children (3 2; 7 23; 30 1–13); and children ought to respect and obey their parents (3 1–16). It is men's duty to defend the truth and to fight for it. So shall the Lord fight for them (4 25.28). Pride is denounced (10 2 ff), and humility (3 18), as well as forgiveness (28 2), commended.

3. Manners

Sir is as much a code of etiquette as one of ethics, the motive being almost invariably the individual's own good. Far more attention is given to "manners" in Sir than in Prov, owing to the fact that a more complex and artificial state of society had arisen in Pal. When one is invited to a banquet he is not to show greed or to be too forward in helping himself to the good things provided. He is to be the first to leave and not to be insatiable (31 12–18). Moderation in eating is necessary for health as well as for appearance' sake (31 19–22). Mourning for the dead is a social propriety, and it should on that account be carefully carried out, since failure to do this brings bad repute (38 16 f). It is quite wrong to stand in front of people's doors, peeping and listening: only fools do this (21 23 f). Music and wine are praised: nay even a "concert of music" and a "banquet of wine" are good in their season and in moderation (32 [LXX 35] 5 f). The author has not a high opinion of woman (25 13). A man is to be on his strict guard against singing and dancing girls and harlots, and adultery is an evil to be feared and avoided (36 18–26). From a woman sin began, and it is through her that we all die (25 4). Yet no one has used more eulogistic terms in praising the good wife than Ben Sira (26 1 ff), or in extolling the happiness of the home when the husband and wife "walk together in agreement" (25 1).

4. Counsels of Prudence

Never lend money to a man more powerful than thyself or thou wilt probably lose it (8 12). It is unwise to become surety for another (29 18; 8 13), yet for a good man one would become surety (29 14) and he would even lend to him (29 1 ff). It should be remembered that in those times lending and becoming financially liable were acts of kindness, pure and simple: the Jewish Law forbade the taking of interest in any form (see Century Bible, "Ezra," etc, 198). "A slip on a pavement is better than a slip with the tongue," so guard thy mouth (20 18); "He that is wise in words shall advance himself; and one that is prudent will please great men" (20 27). The writer has the pride of his class, for he thinks the common untrained mind, that of the ploughman, carpenter and the like, has little capacity for dealing with problems of the intellect (38 24–34).

V. Literary Form.—The bulk of the book is poetical in form, abounding in that parallelism which characterizes Heb poetry, though it is less antithetic and regular than in Prov. No definite meter has been discovered, though Bickell, Margoliouth and others maintain the contrary (see Poetry, Hebrew). Even in the prose parts parallelism is found. The only strophic arrangement is that suggested by similarity of subject-matter.

Bickell (Zeitschr. für katholische Theol., 1882) tr^d 51 1–20 back into Heb and tried to prove that it is an alphabetic acrostic ps, and Taylor supports this view by an examination of the lately discovered fragments of the Heb text (see The Wisdom of Ben Sira, etc, by S. Schechter and C. Taylor, lxxix ff). After 51 12 of the Gr and other VSS the Heb has a ps of 15 verses closely resembling Ps 136; but the Heb VS of 51 1–20 does not favor Bickell's view, nor does the ps, found only in the Heb, lend much support to what either Bickell or Taylor says. Space precludes detailed proofs.

1. Jesus, Son of Sirach

VI. Author.—The proper name of the author was Jesus (Jeshua, Gr Iēsous[?]), the family name being "Ben Sira." The full name would be therefore "Jesus Ben Sira." In the Talm and other Jewish writings he is known as "Ben Sira," lit. "son [or descendant?] of Sira." Who Sira was is unknown. No other book in the Apoc gives the name of its author as the Prologue to Sir does. In the best Gr MSS (B ℵ A) of 50 27, the author's name appears as Ἰησοῦς υἱὸς Σειρὰχ Ἐλεαζάρ ὁ Ἱεροσολυμείτης, Iēsoús huiós Seirách Eleazár ho Hierosolumeítēs, "Jesus the son of Sirach [son of] Eleazar the Jerusalemite." For the last two words ℵ has by a copyist's error, ὁ ἱερεὺς ὁ Σολυμείτης, ho hiereús ho Solumeítēs, "the Solomon-like priest." The Heb text of 50 27 and 51 30 gives the following genealogy: Simeon son of Jesus, son of Eleazar, son of Sira, making the author the grandson and not the son of Sira, and so he is called by Saadia; see HDB (Nestle) and EB, II, 1165 (Toy). We know nothing of Ben Sira beyond what can be gathered from the book itself. He was a resident in Pal (24 10 f), an orthodox Jew, well read in at least Jewish lit., a shrewd observer of life, with a philosophical bent, though true to the national faith. He had traveled far and seen much (34 11 f). His interests were too general and his outlook too wide to allow of his being either a priest or a scribe.

Many suppositions have been put forward as to the author's identity.

2. Other Views

(1) That the author was a priest: so in cod. ℵ (50 27). In 7 29–31 he speaks much of the priesthood, and there are numerous references to sacrifices in the book. In 45 6–26 he has a long poem in praise of Aaron and his high-priesthood. Yet on the whole Ben Sira does not write as a priest.

(2) That he was a high priest: so Syncellus (Chron, ed Dindf., 1 525) through a misunderstanding of a passage in Eusebius. But the teaching and temper of the book make this supposition more improbable than the last.

(3) That he was a physician: an inference drawn from 38 1 f.12 ff and other references to the professional healer of the body (10 10). But this is a very small foundation on which to build so great an edifice.

(4) That he was one of the 72 translators (LXX): so Lapide (Comm.), Calmet, Goldhager, a wholly unsupported hypothesis.

(5) No one of course believes that Solomon wrote the book, though many of the early Fathers held that he was the author of the five Wisdom Books, Prov, Eccl, Cant, Sir and Wisd.

VII. Unity and Integrity.—There is, on the whole, such a uniformity in the style and teaching of the book that most scholars agree in ascribing the whole book (except the Prologue, which is the work of the translator) to Ben Sira. This does not mean that he composed every line; he must have adopted current sayings, written and oral, and this will account for the apparent contradictions, as about becoming surety (29 14), and refusing to become surety (8 13; 29 18); words in praise (25 1; 26 1 ff) and condemnation of women (25 4.13; 36 18–26); the varying estimates of life (36 16–35;

40 1–11), etc. But in these seeming opposites we have probably no more than complementary principles, the whole making up the complete truth. Nothing is more manifest in the book than the all-pervading thought of one dominant mind. Some have denied the genuineness of ch 51, but the evidence is at least indecisive. There is nothing in this chapter inconsistent with the rest of the book.

In the recently discovered fragments of Heb text there is a ps between vs 12 and 13 of the Gr and EV which seems a copy of Ps 136. It is absent from the VSS and its genuineness is doubtful. But in both the Heb and Gr texts there are undoubted additions and omissions. There are, in the Gr, frequent glosses by Christian editors or copyists and other changes (by the translators?) in the direction of Alexandrian Judaism; see Speaker's Apoc and other comms. for details.

VIII. Date.—In the book itself there is one mark of definite date (50 1), and in the Prologue there is another. Unfortunately both are ambiguous. In the Prologue the translator, whose grandfather or ancestor (Gr πάππος, páppos) wrote the book (the younger Siracides, as he is called), says that he reached Egypt, where he found and tr^{d} this book in the reign of Euergetes, king of Egypt. But there were two Egyp kings called Euergetes, viz. Ptolemy Euergetes, or Euergetes I (247–222 BC), and Ptolemy VII Physcon, or Euergetes II (218–198 BC). Sir 50 1 mentions, among the great men whom he praises, Simon the high priest, son of Onias, who is named last in the list and lived probably near the time of the elder Siracides. But there were two high priests called Simon and each of them was a son of Onias, viz. Simon I, son of Onias I (c 310–290 BC), and Simon II, son of Onias II (c 218–198 BC). Scholars differ as to which Euergetes is meant in the Prologue and which Simon in 50 1.

1. Most Probable Views

The conclusions to which the evidence has brought the present writer are these: (1) that Simon I (d. 290 BC) is the high priest meant; (2) that Ptolemy VII Physcon (218–198 BC) is the Euergetes meant.

(1) In favor of the first proposition are the following:

(a) The book must have been written some time after the death of Simon, for in the meantime an artificial fame had gathered around the name, and the very allusion to him as a hero of the past makes it clear that he had been long dead. Assuming that Simon had died in 290 BC, as seems likely, it is a reasonable conclusion that the original Heb work was composed somewhat later than 250 BC. If Simon II is the man intended, the book could hardly have been composed before 150 BC, an impossible date; see below.

(b) In the list of great men in chs 44–50 the praises of Simon (50 1 ff) are sung after those of Nehemiah (49 13), suggesting that the space of time between them was not very great.

(c) The "Simon the Just" of Jos was certainly Simon I, he being so called, this Jewish historian says (Ant, XII, ii, 5), on account of his piety and kindness.

(d) It is probable that the "Simon the Just" of the Mish ('Ābh i.2) is also Simon I, though this is not certain. It is said of him that he was one of the last members of the great synagogue and in the Talm he is the hero of many glorifying legends. The so-called great synagogue never really existed, but the date assigned to it in Jewish tradition shows that it is Simon I that is thought of.

(e) In the Syr VS (Pesh) 50 23 reads thus: "Let it [peace] be established with Simon the Just," etc. Some MSS have "Simon the Kind." This text may of course be wrong, but Graetz and Edersheim support it. This is the exact title given to Simon I by Jos (op. cit.), the Mish and by Jewish tradition generally.

(f) The only references to Simon II in Jewish history and tradition depict him in an unfavorable light. In 2 Macc 3 he is the betrayer of the temple to the Syrians. Even if the incident of the above chapter were unhistorical, there must have been some basis for the legend. Jos (Ant, XII, iv, 10 f) makes him side with the sons of Tobias against Hyrcanus, son of Joseph, the wrong side from the orthodox Jewish point of view.

(g) The high priest Simon is said (50 1–13) to have repaired the temple and fortified the city. Edersheim says that the temple and city stood in need of what is here described in the time of Simon I, but not in the time of Simon II, for Ptolemy I (247–222 BC) in his wars with Demetrius destroyed many fortifications in Pal to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy, among which Acco, Joppa, Gaza are named, and it is natural to think that the capital and its sanctuary were included. This is, however, but a priori reasoning, and Derenbourg argues that Simon II must be meant, since according to Jos (Ant, XII, iii, 3) Antiochus the Great (223–187 BC) wrote a letter in which he undertakes that the city and temple of Jerus shall be fully restored. This is not, however, to say that Simon II or anyone else did, at that time, restore either.

(h) Of the numerous errors in the Gr text some at least seem due to the fact that the VS in that language was made so long after the composition of the original Heb that the sense of several Heb words had become lost among the Alexandrian Jews. If we assume that the Simon of ch 50 was Simon I (d. 290 BC), so that the Heb work was composed about 250 BC; if we further assume that the Euergetes of the Prologue was Ptolemy VII (d. 198 BC), there is a reasonable space of time to allow the sense of the Heb to be lost in many instances (see Halévy, Rev. Sem., July, 1899). It must be admitted that there is no decisive evidence on one side or the other, but the balance weighs in favor of Simon I in the opinion of the present writer.

(2) That the Euergetes of the Prologue in whose reign the translation was made must have been Ptolemy VII Physcon, Euergetes II, seems proved by the translator's statement that he came to Egypt in the 38th year, ἐπὶ τοῦ Εὐεργέτου βασιλέως, epí toú Euergétou basiléōs, i.e. almost certainly of the reign of Euergetes, for what reason could the younger Siracides have for giving his own age? Now Euergetes I reigned but 25 years, but Euergetes II (Physcon) reigned in all 54 years, from 170 to 145 BC as regent with his father, and from 145 to 116 BC as sole monarch. If we accept this interpretation of the above words, the question is settled. Westcott, however (DB, 1863, I, 479, n. c), says "the words can only mean that the translator in his 38th year came to Egypt during the reign of Euergetes." The other rendering adopted by Eichhorn is, he adds, "absolutely set at variance with the grammatical structure of the sentence." In the second ed of DB (1893) this note has become expunged, and the article as edited by D. S. Margoliouth (I, 841) teaches the contrary view, which is now accepted by nearly all scholars (Schürer, etc). We may therefore assume that the original Heb book was composed about 240–200 BC, or some 50 or more years after the death of Simon I, and that the translation was made about 130 BC, for the younger Siracides came to Egypt in 132 BC, and he gives us to understand in the Prologue that he tr^{d} the Heb work of his grandfather almost immediately after reaching that country. If Simon II (d. 198 BC) is meant in ch 50, we are compelled to assume a date for the original work of about 150 BC in order to allow time for the growth of the halo of legend which had gathered about Simon. The translation must, in that case, have been completed some 20 years after the composition of the Heb, a conclusion which the evidence opposes. The teaching of the book belongs to 200 BC, or slightly earlier. The doctrine of the resurrection taught in Dnl (165 BC) is ignored in Sir, as it has not yet become a Jewish doctrine.

2. Brief Statement of Other Views

(1) That the Euergetes of the Prologue and the Simon of ch 50 are in both cases the first so called. So Hug, Scholz, Welt, Keil, Edersheim (Speaker's Apoc) and many others. The book was accordingly written after 290 BC, perhaps in 250 BC, or later, and the translation was made some time after 220 BC, say 200 BC.

(2) That Euergetes II (d. 116 BC) and Simon II (d. 198 BC) are the two persons referred to. So Eichhorn, De Wette, Ewald, Franz Delitzsch, Hitzig, Schürer.

(3) Hitzig (Psalms, 1836, II, 118) made the original work a product of the Maccabean period—an impossible supposition, for the book says nothing at all about the Maccabees. Moreover, the priestly house of Zadok is praised in this book (chs 50, etc); it was held in little respect during the time of the Maccabean wars, owing to the sympathy it showed toward the Hellenizing party.

IX. Original Languages.—Even before the discovery of the substantial fragments of what is probably the original Heb text of this book, nearly all scholars had reached the conclusion that Sir was composed in Heb. (1) The fact of a Heb original is definitely stated in the Prologue.

1. Composed in Hebrew

(2) Jerome (Praef. in vers. libri Sol.) says that he had seen the Heb original—the same text probably that underlies the fragments recently published, though we cannot be sure of this. (3) Citations apparently from the same Heb text are made not seldom in Talmudic and rabbinical literature. (4) There are some word-plays in the book which in the Gr are lost, but which reappear in the discovered Heb text, e.g. (43 8) ὁ μὴν κατὰ τὸ ὄνομα αὐτῆς ἐστιν αὐξανομένη (read ἀνανεομένη), ho mḗn katá tó ónoma autḗs estin auxanoménē (read ananeoménē), "the month is called after her name," חדש כשמו הוא מתחדש, ḥōdhesh kish^{e}mō hū' mithḥadhēsh, "the moon according to its name renews itself"; the Heb words for "moon" and "renews itself" come from one root, as if we said in English—what of course is not English—"the moon moons itself." There are other cases where mistakes and omissions in the Gr are explained by a reference to the newly found Heb text.

The strongly supported conjecture of former years that the book was composed in Heb was turned into a practical certainty through the discovery, by Dr. S. Schechter and others in 1896 and after, of the fragments of a (probably the) Heb text called now A B C and D. These contain much over half the whole book, and that the text in them, nearly always identical when the same passages are given in more than one, is the original one, is exceedingly likely, to say the least.

2. Margoliouth's View

D. S. Margoliouth (Origin of the Original Heb of Ecclus, 1899) has tried to prove that the Heb text of the fragments is a tr of a Pers VS which is itself derived from Gr and Syr. The proofs he offers have not convinced scholars.

(1) He refers to words in Heb which in that language are senseless, and he endeavors to show that they are disguised Pers words. As a matter of fact, in such cases the copyist has gone wholly wrong or the word is undecipherable.

(2) There do appear to be Pers glosses, but they are no part of the original text, and there can be no reasonable doubt that they are due to a Pers reader or copyist.

(3) There are many cases in which the Heb can be proved to be a better and older text than the Gr or Syr (see König, Expos T, XI, 170 ff).

(4) As regards the character of the language, it may be said that in syntax it agrees in the main with the classical Heb of the OT, but its vocabulary links it with the latest OT books. Thus we have the use of the "waw-consecutive" with the imperfect (43 23; 44 9.23; 45 2 f, etc) and with the perfect (42 1.8.11), though the use of the simple waw with both tenses occurs also. This mixed usage is exactly what meets us in the latest part of the OT (Eccl, Est, etc). As regards vocabulary, the word חֵפֶץ, ḥēpheç, has the sense of "thing," "matter," in 20 9, as in Eccl 3 1; 5 7; 8 6. In general it may be said that the Heb is that of early post-Bib. times. Margoliouth holds that the extant Heb VS is no older than the 11th cent., which is impossible. His mistake is due to confounding the age of the MSS with that of the VS they contain.

(5) It is nevertheless admitted that in some cases the Syr or the Gr or both together preserve an older and correcter text than the Heb, but this because the latter has sometimes been miscopied and intentionally changed.

(6) The numerous Hebraisms in the Gr VS which in the Heb have their original expression point to the same conclusion—that this Heb text is the original form of the book.

Margoliouth has been answered by Smend (TLZ, 1889, col. 506), König (Expos T, X, XI, 1899–1900), Nöldeke (ZATW, XX, 81–94), and by many others. Bickell (Zeitschrift für katholische Theol., III, 387 ff) holds also that the Heb Sir extant is a tr from the Gr or Syr or both.

X. Versions.—The LXX tr was made from the Heb direct; it is fairly correct, though in all the extant MSS the text is very corrupt in several places. (1) The book occurs in the uncials B ℵ C and part of A fairly free from glosses, though abounding in obvious errors. (2) The text is found in a much purer form in cod. V and also in ℵ^{ca} and part of A.

1. Greek

All extant Gr MSS except the late cursive 248 seem to go back to one original MS, since in all of them the two sections 30 25—33 15 and 33 16—36 11 have changed places, so that 33 16—36 11 follows 30 24 and 30 25—33 15 comes after 36 11. Most scholars accept the explanation of Fritzsche (Exeg. Handbuch zu den Apok, V, 21 f) that the two leaves on which these two parts (of similar size) were written got mixed, the wrong one being put first. On the other hand, the cursive 248 (14th cent.) has these sections in their proper order, and the same is true of the Syr (Pesh), Lat and Armenian VSS and of the Gr VS of the Complutensian Polyglot (which follows throughout 248 and not the uncials) and EV which is made from this Polyglot. The superiority of 248 to the older MS (B ℵ A C V) is seen in other parts of the Gr text. In the other Gr MSS, 3 25 is omitted, as it is by Edersheim and most commentators before the discovery of the Heb text. But this last supports 248 in retaining the verse, and it is now generally kept. In 43 23 "islands" is properly read by 248, Vulg, Syr, 23 and the Heb, but older Gr MSS read "Jesus," making nonsense ("And Jesus planted her" [αὐτήν, autḗn] for "he planted islands therein"). The other MSS have a text which yields no sense in 43 26: EV "By reason of him his end hath success." The Gr of 248 and the Heb give this sense: "The angel is equipped for his task," etc.

2. Syriac

The Syr (Pesh) VS is now almost universally acknowledged to have been made from the Heb, of which, on the whole, it is a faithful rendering. In some places, however, it agrees with the LXX against the Heb, probably under the influence of the inaccurate idea that the Gr text is the original one. In this VS the two sections 30 25—33 5 and 33 16—36 11 are in proper order, as in the Heb, a fresh proof that the Syr is not tr^d from the Gr.

The Vulg agrees with the Old Lat which follows the LXX closely. Lapide, Sabatier and Bengel tried to prove that the Vulg was based on the lost original Heb, but the evidence they supply falls far short of proof, and recently discovered Heb fragments show that they were wrong. The two sections transposed in the LXX (except 248) are also transposed in the Lat, showing that the latter is based on the Gr text. The Lat text of both Sir and Wisd according to the cod. Amiant is given by Lagarde in his Mittheilungen, I, 243–84. This closely follows the Gr text.

3. Latin

AV follows the cursives and often repeats their errors. RV is based, for the most part, on the uncials and thus often departs from the Heb. 3 19 is retained by AV but omitted by RV. For the latter clause of the verse ("mysteries are revealed unto the meek"), AV is supported by cod. 248, the Syr and the Heb. Both EV should be corrected by the Heb in 7 26 and 38 1. 15.

4. English

For fuller details concerning VSS see Speaker's Apoc, II, 23–32 (Edersheim); Kautzsch, Die Apok. des AT, I, 242 ff (Ryssel), and the art. by Nestle in HDB, IV, 544 ff.

Literature.—In addition to books mentioned under Apoc and in the course of the present art., note the following:

(1) The text of the Heb fragments: For accounts of the discovery and decipherments of these see HDB, IV, 546 f (Nestle); Bible Polyglotte (F. Vigoureux), V, 4 ff; Schürer, GJV^{4}, III, 221 ff. The text of the Heb as yet known is conveniently printed in the following: H. L. Strack, Die Sprüche Jesus, etc (with notes and glossary), Leipzig, 1903; Isaac Levi, The Heb Text of Ecclesiasticus (with notes and glossary), Leiden, 1906; Rudolf Smend, Die Weisheit des Jesus Sirach, Heb und Deutsch (with notes and glossary), Berlin, 1906. The Heb appears also in the Bible Polyglotte, ed F. Vigoureux, with the LXX, Vulg and a French translation in ‖ columns. (No other Polyglot has appeared since the discovery of the Heb.) There are ‖ texts in Heb, Syr, Gr and Eng., and also useful notes and tables in The Original Heb of Sir 39 15—49 11, by Cowles and Neubauer, Oxford, 1897. Still later and fuller is The Wisdom of Ben Sira in Heb and Eng., with notes on the Heb by Schechter and Taylor, Cambridge, 1899.

(2) Commentaries: The works of Fritzsche (1859), who neglects the evidence of the Syr and ignores the Heb idioms in the book, and of Bissell (1880) and Edersheim (1888) appeared before the discovery of the Heb fragments. The last-named shows both learning and ingenuity in tracking the Heb idioms and in explaining difficulties by means of Heb. The following comms. take full note of the Heb text as far as discovered: Israel Levi, L'Ecclésiastique ou la sagesse de Jésus fils de Sira: traduit et commenté, Paris, 1898, 1901; Ryssel in Kautzsch's Apok. des AT, I, 280–475, exceedingly valuable, esp. for the text and introduction, but he takes account of the Heb fragments published by Cowley and Neubauer only in this book. To complete his treatment of the Heb parts published after he wrote, see further articles by him in Stud. u. Krit., 1900–1–2; Knabenbaur, Commentarius in Ecclesiasticum, Paris, 1902; Peters, Der jüngst wieder aufgefundene hebräische Text des Buches Ecclesiasticus, 1902 (cf the notice by Smend, TLZ, 1903, 72–77); Smend, Die Weisheit des Jesus Sirach erklärt, 1906 (full discussion of the book in the newest light; cf notice by Jülicher in TLZ, 1908, 323–29). The New Oxford Apoc (Intro and Notes), ed by R. H. Charles (1913), contains a full Intro and Comm. J. H. A. Hart has published separately a critical edition of cod. 248, in which he collates the principal authorities, MS and printed.

Of the Dict. articles those in HDB (Nestle, strong in the critical, but weak and defective on the historical and exegetical side); EB (C. H. Toy, sound and well balanced); see also Jew Enc (Israel Levi) and Enc Brit (W. Baxendale). For detailed register of the literature see HDB (Nestle); Jew Enc, "Sirach" (Israel Levi); and esp. SIRACH, THE ALPHABET OF: Usually called The Alphabet of Ben Sira. The compilation so designated consists of two lists of proverbs, 22 in Aram. and 22 in Heb, arranged in each case as alphabet acrostics. Each of these proverbs is followed by a haggadic comm., with legends and tales, many of them indecent. Some of the proverbs in the Alphabets are probably genuine compositions by Ben Sira and are quoted as such in the Talm, but in their present form the Alphabets are at least as late as the 11th cent. AD.

Literature.—The only complete copy of the text known is in the British Museum, the copy in the Bodleian being defective. Steinschneider has published a reprint of this last with critical notes (Alphabeticum Syracidis, Berlin, 1854). Cowley and Neubauer (The Original Heb of a Portion of Ecclus), besides giving a general account of this work, add a tr into Eng. of the Aram. proverbs. In his brief but excellent articles in Jew Enc (Ben Sira, The Alphabet of), Dr. Louis Ginzberg (New York) also gives a tr of the 22 Aram. proverbs with useful remarks after each. The work has been tr^d into Lat, Yiddish (often), Judaeo-Spanish, Fr. and Ger., but never, so far, completely into English.

SIRAH, sī'ra, WELL OF (בּוֹר הַסִּרָה, bōr ha-ṣirāh, "the pit," "well" or "cistern of Sarah"): The spot from which Abner was enticed back to Hebron to his death (2 S 3 26). Jos (Ant, VII, i, 5) calls it Βη(ρ)σιρά, Bē(r)sirá, implying that it was a "well." It is possible that this spot is now 'Ain Sārah, a spring which flows into a little tank near the west side of the road about a mile out of ancient Hebron, on the way to Jerus. There is, however, a curious cistern with steps known as Ḥamam Sarah ("Sarah's bath") near Ramet el-Khalîl, which is also possibly the site (PEF, 314, Sh XXI).

SIRION, sir'i-on (שִׂרְיוֹן, siryōn; Σανιώρ, Saniṓr): The name of Mt. Hermon among the Phoenicians (Dt 3 9). It is given as "Shirion" in Ps 29 6 (Heb "breastplate" or "body armor"). Here it is named with Lebanon. Sirion therefore probably did not denote a particular part of the Hermon Range, as did Senir, but may have been suggested by the conformation of the range itself, as seen from the heights above the Phoen coast.

SISERA, sis'ẽr-a (סִיסְרָא, ṣīṣ^{e}rā', of doubtful meaning; Σ[ε]ισάρα, S[e]isára):

(1) Given in Jgs 4 as the captain of the army of Jabin, king of Hazor. The accounts given of the battle of Sisera with Barak, as found in Jgs 4 and 5, have important points of difference. The first is a prose, the second a poetic narrative. In the first only Naphtali and Zebulun are mentioned as being under the command of Barak; in the second 6 tribes are given as being under his command. In Jgs 4 Sisera is known as the captain of Jabin's forces, while in Jgs 5 he seems to have been an independent leader. There is also a difference as to the scene of the battle and as to the manner in which Sisera met his death at the hand of Jael. Because of these points of difference, added to the fact that this is the only account, in these early times, where a king did not lead his own forces, it is thought by many that there is here the combination of two traditions dealing with different and distinct events.

Sisera resided in Harosheth of the Gentiles, a place identified with el-Ḥārithīyeh, on the right bank of the Kishon and commanding the way from the Central Plain to the sea. Taking the versions in the two chapters of Jgs as being the account of a single campaign, we find Deborah urging Barak to combine the forces of Israel to wage war with Sisera as the representative of Jabin, the king of Hazor. The scene of the battle was on the plain at the foot of the slopes of Mt. Tabor (4 12–14), or at the foot of the Carmel heights (5 19). The attack of Barak and Deborah was so furious, animated as it was by the hatred of Sisera and the Canaanites, that the hosts of Sisera were put to rout, and Sisera, deserting his troops, fled on foot to the N.E. He took refuge in the tent of Heber, near Kedesh, and here met death at the hands of Jael, the wife of Heber (see Jael). Sisera's name had long produced fear in Israel because of his oppression of the people, his vast army and his 900 chariots of iron. His overthrow was the cause of much rejoicing and was celebrated by the song in which Deborah led the people. See Deborah.

It is interesting to note that the great rabbi Aḳiba, who fought so valiantly in the Jewish war for independence as standard bearer to Bar-cocheba, was descended from the ancient warlike Sisera of Harosheth.

(2) In Ezr 2 53 and Neh 7 55 the name Sisera, after a long interval, reappears in a family of the Nethinim. There is no evidence that the latter Sisera is connected by family descent with the former.

SISINNES, si-sin′ēz (Σισίννης, Sisínnēs): "The eparch [governor] of Syria and Phoenicia" under Darius Hystaspis (1 Esd 6 3.7.27; 7 1) c 520 BC= "Tattenai the governor beyond the river" in Ezr 5 3.6; 6 6.13. He took a prominent part in the efforts to prevent the rebuilding of the temple.

SISMAI, sis′mī (סִסְמַי, ṣiṣmay; AV Sisamai): A Judahite, of the descendants of the daughter of Sheshan and Jarha, his Egyp servant (1 Ch 2 40). Commentators have compared the name to ססם, ṣṣm, a Phoen god (cf Rudolph Kittel, Comm. ad loc.; BDB, s.v.).

SISTER, sis′tẽr (אָחוֹת, 'āḥōth): Used repeatedly in the OT of a female (1) having the same parents as another; or (2) having one parent in common, with another, half-sister (Gen 20 12; Lev 18 9), and also (3) of a female belonging to the same family or clan as another, so a kinswoman (Gen 24 60; Job 42 11); (4) also of a woman of the same country (Nu 25 18). (5) Figuratively, the two kingdoms, Israel and Judah, are sisters (Ezk 23 7 ff). (6) Confederate cities are conceived of as sisters (Ezk 16 45 ff). (7) 'Āḥōth is used of objects which go in pairs, as curtains, each 'coupled to its sister' (Ex 26 3.6), and of wings in pairs (Ezk 1 9; 3 13); (8) of virtues or conditions, with which one is closely related: "Say unto wisdom, thou art my sister" (Prov 7 4; cf Job 17 14); (9) of a lover concerning his spouse, as a term of endearment (Cant 4 9 f; 5 1 f; 8 8).

In the NT, ἀδελφή, adelphḗ, used (1) in sense of physical or blood kinship (Mt 12 50; 13 56; 19 29; Lk 10 39 f; 14 26; Jn 11 1 ff; 19 25; Acts 23 16); (2) of fellow-members in Christ: "Phoebe, our sister" (Rom 16 1; see also 1 Cor 7 15; 1 Tim 5 1; Jas 2 15); (3) possibly, of a church, "thy elect sister" (2 Jn ver 13). See Relationships, Family.

Edward Bagby Pollard

SISTER'S SON: AV translates rightly (1) בֶּן־אֲחוֹתוֹ, ben-'ăḥōthō (Gen 29 13); and (2) υἱὸς τῆς ἀδελφῆς, huiós tḗs adelphḗs (Acts 23 16), and wrongly, (3) ἀνεψιός, anepsiós (Col 4 10), where, without doubt, the real meaning is "cousin," as in RV. See Relationships, Family.

SITH, sith: An Anglo-Saxon word meaning "afterward," "since" (Ezk 35 6 AV and ERV, ARV "since").

SITHRI, sith′rī (סִתְרִי, ṣithrī): A grandson of Kohath (Ex 6 22).

SITNAH, sit′na (שִׂטְנָה, siṭnāh, "hatred," "hostility"; ἐχθρία, echthría): The name of the second of the two wells dug by the herdsmen of Isaac, the cause of further "enmity" with the herdsmen of Gerer (Gen 26 21, m "That is, Enmity"). The site is unknown, but Palmer (PEFS, 1871) finds an echo of the name in Shuṭnet er Ruḥeibeh, the name of a small valley near Ruḥeibeh. See Rehoboth.

SITTING, sit′ing (יָשַׁב, yāshabh, "to sit down or still," דָּגַר, dāghar, "to brood," "hatch"; καθέζομαι, kathézomai, "to sit down," ἀνάκειμαι, anákeimai, "to lie back," "recline"): The favorite position of the Orientals (Mal 3 3; Mt 9 9; 26 55 [cf 5 1; Lk 4 20; 5 3]; Mk 14 18; Lk 18 35; Jn 2 14, etc).

> "In Pal people sit at all kinds of work; the carpenter saws, planes, and hews with his hand-adze, sitting upon the ground or upon the plank he is planing. The washerwoman sits by the tub, and, in a word, no one stands where it is possible to sit. . . . On the low shop-counters the turbaned salesmen squat in the midst of the gay wares" (LB, II, 144, 275; III, 72, 75).

Figurative: (1) To sit with denotes intimate fellowship (Ps 1 1; 26 5; Lk 13 29; Rev 3 21); (2) to sit in the dust indicates poverty and contempt (Isa 47 1), in darkness, ignorance (Mt 4 16) and trouble (Mic 7 8); (3) to sit on thrones denotes authority, judgment, and glory (Mt 19 28).

M. O. Evans

SIVAN, sḗ-vän′, sī′van (סִיוָן, ṣīwān): The third month of the Jewish year, corresponding to June (Est 8 9). See Calendar.

SIXTY, siks′ti (שִׁשִּׁים, shishshīm; ἑξήκοντα, hexḗkonta). See Number.

SKILL, skil, SKILFUL, skil′fool (forms of יָדַע, yādha' [2 Ch 2 14, etc], בִּין, bīn [1 Ch 15 22], שָׂכַל, sākhal [Dnl 1 4, etc], לָמַד, lāmadh [1 Ch 5 18], חָכָם, ḥākham [1 Ch 28 21], חָרַשׁ, ḥārash [Ezk 21 31], יָטַב, yāṭabh [Ps 33 3]; in Apoc ἐμπειρία, empeiría [Wisd 13 13], ἐπιστήμη, epistḗmē [Sir 1 19; 38 3.6]; advb. εὐμαθῶς, eumathôs [Wisd 13 11]): As a vb. "to skill," meaning to have understanding or to be dexterous, common in Elizabethan Eng. and in AV and ERV (1 K 5 6; 2 Ch 2 7 f; 34 12), is obsolete. ARV substitutes such expressions as "knoweth how" (1 K 5 6) and "were skilful with" (2 Ch 34 12). As a noun the word is used in the sense of "knowledge" (Eccl 9 11), "insight" (Dnl 1 17), and "wisdom" (1 Ch 28 21). The adj. skilful is used in corresponding senses, esp. in ARV, where it takes the place of "cunning" (Ex 26 31; 31 4; 35 33.35; 38 23; 2 Ch 2 7.13.14; Cant 7 1; Isa 40 20; Jer 10 9) and of "curious" (Ex 35 32), where the Heb ḥāshabh suggests planning or devising, and thus what we should call "original" work. Both ERV and ARV use the word in place of "eloquent" (Isa 3 3), "right" (Eccl 4 4) and "cunning" (1 Ch 25 7). In the first of these instances the Heb word means "understanding"; in the second, it refers to the manner of doing a thing, and in the third, to the training that makes one "skilled." RV uses the word "skilled" of those that "took the war upon them" (Nu 31 27 AV). Skilfulness (Ps 78 72) is used with reference to the hands, not only in their work, but also in guiding (as, e.g., a pilot). To play well (Heb hēṭībhū naggēn) is rendered "play skilfully" (Ps 33 3). "Unskilful" is used with reference to the uninitiated in the sense of "inexperienced" (He 5 13, ἄπειρος, ápeiros).

SKIN (עוֹר, 'ōr, גֶּלֶד, geledh, "human skin" [Job 16 15], בָּשָׂר, bāsār, "flesh," in the sense of "nakedness" [Ps 102 5 AV]; δέρμα, dérma):

Literal: The word 'ōr designates the skin of both men and animals, the latter both raw and in tanned condition: "Jeh God made for Adam and for his wife coats of skins ['ōr], and clothed them" (Gen 3 21); "She put the skins ['ōr] of the kids of the goats upon his hands, and upon the smooth of his neck" (27 16); "Can the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard his spots?" (Jer 13 23). The Heb geledh is found in the sense of human skin: "I have sewed sackcloth upon my skin, and have laid my horn in the dust" (Job 16 15).

Figurative: 'To escape by the skin of the teeth' is equivalent to a narrow escape (Job 19 20). Satan says in his calumny of Job: "Skin for skin, yea, all that a man hath will he give for his life" (2 4). The idea here is, that a man will endure or do the worst, even as it were the flaying of his body, to save his life. The RV has replaced "skin" as the tr of Heb bāsār by "flesh": "My bones cleave to my flesh" (Ps 102 5). "The bars of his skin" is a poetical expression for "the members of his body" in Job 18 13 m, where the text interprets rather than translates the original.

Skins served for purposes of clothing from an early date (Gen 3 21). In later days they were the raiment of prophets and hermits (Zec 13 4; He 11 37). LXX translates אַדֶּרֶת, 'addereth, "the mantle" of Elijah (1 K 19 13.19; 2 K 2 8.13 f), with μηλωτή, mēlōtē, i.e. "sheepskin," the word in He being derived from these passages. It is not unlikely that the raiment of John the Baptist made "of camel's hair" and the "leathern girdle about his loins" are identical with the rough garb of OT prophets. The skins of cattle were largely employed for technical uses; "rams' skins and badgers' skins" are esp. mentioned in the construction of the tabernacle as material for the waterproof covering of the roof (Ex 25 5; Nu 4 8.10 ff).

RV, rejecting the tr "badgers' skins," substitutes "sealskins" and adds "porpoise skins" in the margin. There is little doubt that the rendering of the AV is indeed incorrect. The Heb name of the animal (taḥash) is the same as the Arab. توحس, tūḥas, which means the dolphin and the "sea-cow" or halicore of the Red Sea, of which genus there are two species even now extant (H. tabernaculi Russ, and H. Helprichii Ehr.). It is probable that the Jews included various marine animals, seals, porpoises, dolphins and halicores, under the same expression. See SEALSKIN.

In Ezk 16 10 we find these skins mentioned as material for elegant shoes, and the Arabs of the Red Sea littoral use the same material in the manufacture of sandals. A quaint use was made of skins in the making of skin bottles, the ḳurbeh or ḳirbeh of modern Arabia. We find a great variety of Heb expressions, which possibly designated special varieties, all of which were rendered ἀσκός, askós, in LXX and the NT (חֵמֶת, ḥēmeth, נֹאד, נֹאוד, nō'dh, נֹאדָה, nō'dhāh, נֶבֶל, nebhel, נֵבֶל, nēbhel, בַּקְבֻּק, baḳbuḳ, אוֹב, 'ōbh). RV has rendered the Gr askos in the NT by "wineskin" (Mt 9 17; Mk 2 22; Lk 5 37) with the marginal addition "that is, skins used as bottles." These skin bottles were made of the skins of goats, sheep, oxen or buffaloes; the former had more or less the shape of the animals, the holes of the extremities being closed by tying or sewing, and the neck of the skin being closed by a tap or a plug, while the larger ones were sewn together in various shapes. As a rule only the inside of the skin was tanned, the skin turned inside out, and the fluid or semi-fluid filled in, e.g. water, milk, butter, cheese. The hairy inside was not considered as in any way injurious to the contents. Only in the case of wine- and oil-skins was it thought advantageous to tan the skins inside and out.

SKIRT, skûrt: (1) כָּנָף, kānāph, "wing," "extremity" (Ruth 3 9, etc), is the usual word. But in 1 S 24 4 ff perhaps "corner" is the best tr. (2) שׁוּל, shūl, "loose hanging" (Ex 28 33, etc; in AV often rendered "hem"). (3) פֶּה, peh, "mouth," "opening" (Ps 133 2, "the precious oil . . . . that came down upon the skirt"). But the "opening" is that for the head, so that RVm "collar" is the correct tr. "Skirt" is frequently used in a euphemistic sense, for which the comms. must be consulted. See DRESS; TRAIN.

SKULL, skul (גֻּלְגֹּלֶת, gulgōleth; κρανίον, kraníon): The Heb word, which is well known to Bible readers in its Aram.-Gr form "Golgotha," expresses the more or less globular shape of the human skull, being derived from a root meaning "to roll." It is often trd in EV by "head," "poll," etc. In the meaning "skull" it is found twice (Jgs 9 53; 2 K 9 35). In the NT the word is found only in connection with GOLGOTHA (q.v.), "the place of a skull" (Mt 27 33; Mk 15 22; Jn 19 17), or "the skull" (Lk 23 33).

1. In the OT

SKY, skī (שַׁחַק, shaḥaḳ, "fine dust" or "cloud," apparently from √ שָׁחַק, shāḥaḳ, "to rub," "to pulverize"; Sam שְׁחָקַיָּה, sheḥāḳayyāh instead of Heb שָׁמַיִם, shāmayim; سحق, saḥḳ = "cloud," "small dust"): RV has "skies" for AV "clouds" in Job 35 5; 36 28; 37 21; Ps 36 5; 57 10; 68 34; 78 23; 108 4; Prov 3 20; 8 28, in which passages BDB supports the rendering of AV. In Ps 89 6.37 RV has "sky" for AV "heaven." EV has "sky" in Dt 33 26; 2 S 22 12; Job 37 18; Ps 18 11; 77 17; Isa 45 8; Jer 51 9. The word occurs mainly in poetical passages.

2. In the NT

In the NT οὐρανός, ouranós, is trd "heaven" (AV "sky") in connection with the weather in Mt 16 2.3; Lk 12 56. In He 11 12 we find "the stars of heaven" ("the sky") as a figure of multitude. The conception, however, that the visible "sky" is but the dome-like floor of a higher world often makes it hard to tell whether "heaven" in certain passages may or may not be identified with the sky. See HEAVEN; COSMOGONY.

SLANDER, slan'dẽr (subst., דִּבָּה, dibbāh, "slander"; διάβολος, diábolos, "slanderer"; vb. רָגַל, rāghal, "to slink about" as a talebearer, לָשַׁן, lāshan, "to use the tongue," "to slander"; διαβάλλω, diabállō, "to calumniate," "to slander"; and other words): Slander (etymologically a doublet of "scandal," from OFr. esclandre, Lat scandalum, "stumbling-block") is an accusation maliciously uttered, with the purpose or effect of damaging the reputation of another. As a rule it is a false charge (cf Mt 5 11); but it may be a truth circulated insidiously and with a hostile purpose (e.g. Dnl 3 8, "brought accusation against," where LXX has diaballō, "slander"; Lk 16 1, the same Gr word). Warnings, condemnations and complaints in reference to this sin are very frequent, both in the OT and NT. Mischievous "tale-bearing" or "whispering" is condemned (Lev 19 16; Ezk 22 9). There are repeated warnings against evil-speaking (as in Ps 34 13; Prov 15 28; Eph 4 31; Col 3 8; Jas 4 11; 1 Pet 3 10), which is the cause of so much strife between man and man (Prov 16 27–30), and which recoils on the speaker himself to his destruction (Ps 101 5; 140 11). Esp. is false witness, which is "slander carried into a court of justice," to be condemned and punished (Ex 20 16; Dt 19 16–21; cf Prov 12 17; 14 5.25; 19 5; 21 28; 24 28). Special cases of slander more than usually mean are when a wife's chastity is falsely impeached by her husband (Dt 22 13–19), and when one slanders a servant to his master (Prov 30 10). Even a land may be slandered as well as persons (Nu 14 36). Slanderers and backbiters are mentioned in some of Paul's darkest catalogues of evildoers (Rom 1 29.30; 2 Cor 12 20; 2 Tim 3 3). To refrain from slander is an important qualification for citizenship in the theocracy (Ps 15 1.3; 24 3.4) and for a place in the Christian church (1 Tim 3 11; Tit 2 3). Jesus Himself was the victim of slanders (Mt 11 19) and of false testimony (Mt 27 63). The apostles, too, came in for a full share of it (e.g. Acts 24 5 f; 28 22; 2 Cor 6 8). In the case of Paul, even his central doctrine of justification was "slanderously reported" as if it encouraged immorality (Rom 3 8). The devil (="the calumniator") is represented as the great accuser of God's people (Rev 12 10), the slanderer par excellence (cf Job 1 9–11; Zec 3 1). See also CRIMES; PUNISHMENTS.

LITERATURE

The origin of the term "slave" is traced to the Ger. sklave, meaning a captive of the Slavonic race who had been forced into servitude (cf Slav); Fr. esclave, Dutch slaaf, Swedish slaf, Spanish esclavo. The word "slave" occurs only in Jer 2 14 and in Rev 18 13, where it is suggested by the context and not expressed in the original languages (Heb yᵉlīdh bayith, "one born in the house"; Gr sôma, "body"). However, the Heb word עֶבֶד, ʽebhedh, in the OT and the Gr word δοῦλος, doúlos, in the NT more properly might have been trᵈ "slave" instead of "servant" or "bondservant," understanding though that the slavery of Judaism was not the cruel system of Greece, Rome and later nations. The prime thought is service; the servant may render free service, the slave, obligatory, restricted service.

Scripture statement rather than philological study must form the basis of this article. We shall notice how slaves could be secured, sold and redeemed; also their rights and their masters' rights, confining the study to OT Scripture, noting in conclusion the NT conception. The word "slave" in this art. refers to the Heb slave unless otherwise designated.

Slaves might be acquired in the following ways, viz.:

1. Acquiring of Slaves

(1) Bought.—There are many instances of buying slaves (Lev 25 39 ff). Heb slavery broke into the ranks of every human relationship: a father could sell his daughter (Ex 21 7; Neh 5 5); a widow's children might be sold to pay their father's debt (2 K 4 1); a man could sell himself (Lev 25 39.47); a woman could sell herself (Dt 15 12.13.17), etc. Prices paid were somewhat indefinite. According to Ex 21 32 thirty shekels was a standard price, but Lev 27 3–7 gives a scale of from 3 to 50 shekels according to age and sex, with a provision for an appeal to the priest in case of uncertainty (ver 8). Twenty shekels is the price set for a young man (ver 5), and this corresponds with the sum paid for Joseph (Gen 37 28).

But in 2 Macc 8 11 the price on the average is 90 for a talent, i.e. 40 shekels each. The ransom of an entire talent for a single man (1 K 20 39) means that unusual value (far more than that of a slave) was set on this particular captive.

There were certain limitations on the right of sale (Ex 21 7 ff).

(2) Exchange.—Slaves, i.e. non-Heb slaves, might be traded for other slaves, cattle, or provisions.

(3) Satisfaction of debt.—It is probable that a debtor, reduced to extremity, could offer himself in payment of his debt (Lev 25 39), though this was forbidden in the Tōrath Kōhănīm; cf 'Ōçar Yisrā'ēl, vii.292*b*. That a creditor could sell into slavery a debtor or any of his family, or make them his own slaves, has some foundation in the statement of the poor widow whose pathetic cry reached the ears of the prophet Elisha: "Thy servant my husband is dead; . . . . and the creditor is come to take unto him my two children to be bondmen" (2 K 4 1).

(4) Gift.—The non-Heb slave, and possibly the Heb slave, could be acquired as a gift (Gen 29 24).

(5) Inheritance.—Children could inherit non-Heb slaves as their own possessions (Lev 25 46).

(6) Voluntary surrender.—In the case of a slave's release in the seventh year there was allowed a willing choice of indefinite slavery. The ceremony at such a time is interesting: "Then his master shall bring him unto the judges [m], and shall bring him to the door, or unto the door-post; and his master shall bore his ear through with an awl; and he shall serve him for ever" (Ex 21 6). A pierced ear probably meant obedience to the master's voice. History, however, does not record a single instance in which such a case occurred.

(7) Arrest.—"If the thief be found breaking in, ... he shall make restitution: if he have nothing, then he shall be sold for his theft" (Ex 22 2.3).

(8) Birth.—The children of slaves, born within the master's house of a wife given to the slave there, became slaves, and could be held, even if the father went free (Ex 21 4; cf Lev 25 54).

(9) Capture in war.—Thousands of men, women and children were taken in war as captives and reduced, sometimes, to most menial slavery. Such slavery, however, was more humane than wholesale butchery according to the customs of earlier times (Nu 31 7–35). Males were usually slain and females kept for slavery and concubinage (Dt 21 10.11.14). Captive slaves and bought slaves, "from nations round about," forced moral ruin into Israel's early civilization. See SIEGE, 3.

The two principal sources of slave supply were poverty in peace and plunder in war.

2. Hebrews as War Captives

The Hebrews themselves were held as captive slaves at various times by (1) Phoenicians (the greatest slave traders of ancient times), (2) Philis, (3) Syrians (2 K 5 2 ff), (4) Egyptians, and (5) Romans. There must have been thousands subjected to severest slavery. See also EGYPT; ISRAEL; PHARAOH; SERVANT, etc.

The freedom of slaves was possible in the following ways:

3. Freedom of Slaves

(1) By redemption.—Manumission by redemption was common among the Hebrews. The slave's freedom might be bought, the price depending on (a) the nearness to the seventh year or the Jubilee year, (b) the first purchase price, and (c) personal considerations as to age and ability of the one in bondage. A slave could be redeemed as follows:

(a) by himself, (b) by his uncle, (c) by his nephew or cousin, (d) or by any near relative (Lev 25 48–55). The price depended on certain conditions as indicated above.

(2) By the lapse of time.—The seventh year of service brought release from bondage. "If thou buy a Heb servant [m "bondman"], six years he shall serve: and in the seventh he shall go out free for nothing" (Ex 21 2–4).

(3) By the law of the Jubilee year.—The year of Jubilee was the great year when slaves were no longer slaves but free. "He shall serve with thee unto the year of jubilee: then shall he go out from thee, he and his children . . . . return unto his own family, and unto the possession of his fathers" (Lev 25 40 f).

(4) By injury.—A servant whose master maimed him (or her), in particular by causing the loss of an eye or even a tooth, was thereby freed (Ex 21 26 f).

(5) By escape.—(Dt 23 15 f; 1 K 2 39). See "Code of Ḫammurabi" in HDB (extra vol, p. 600) and cf Philem vs 12 ff.

(6) By indifference.—In case of a certain kind of female slave, the neglect or displeasure of her master in itself gave her the right to freedom (Ex 21 7–11; Dt 21 14).

(7) By restitution.—A caught thief, having become a bondsman, after making full restitution by his service as a slave, was set at liberty (Ex 22 1–4).

(8) By the master's death.—"And Abram said, ... I go childless, and he that shall be possessor of my house is Eliezer of Damascus . . . . and, lo, one born in my house is mine heir" (Gen 15 2 f). This passage has been mistakenly supposed to indicate that a master without children might give freedom to a slave by constituting the slave an heir to his possessions. But on the contrary, Abram seems to contemplate with horror the possibility that Eliezer will take possession of his goods in the absence of an heir. In view of the fact that adoption, the adrogatio of the Rom law, was unknown both to Bib. and Talmudic law (see Jew Enc, s.v.), the statement in Gen 15 2 does not seem to indicate any such custom as the adoption of slaves. If any method of emancipation is here suggested, it is by the death of the master without heir, a method thoroughly discussed in the Talm (mīthath hā-’ădhōn).

(9) By direct command of Jeh.—"The word that came unto Jeremiah from Jeh, ... that every man should let his man-servant, and . . . . his maid-servant, that is a Hebrew or a Hebrewess, go free; that none should make bondmen of them . . . . they obeyed, and let them go" (Jer 34 8–10).

The nine methods here enumerated may be classified thus:

A. By operation of law:
  1. By lapse of time.
    (a) After serving six years or other contractual period. See (2) above.
    (b) Upon the approach of the Jubilee year. See (3) above.
  2. By death of the master without heirs. See (8) above.
B. By act of the parties:
  1. By an act of the master.
    (a) Voluntary manumission, including (9) above.
    (b) Indifference in certain cases. See (6) above.
    (c) Maiming servant. See (4) above.
  2. By act of the servant.
    (a) Redemption. See (1) above.
    (b) Restitution. See (7) above.
    (c) Escape. See (5) above.
  3. By act of a third party.
    Redemption—(1) above.

4. Rights of Slaves

As noted in the beginning of this article, the Heb slaves fared far better than the Grecian, Rom and other slaves of later years. In general, the treatment they received and the rights they could claim made their lot reasonably good. Of course a slave was a slave, and there were masters who disobeyed God and even abused their "brothers in bonds." As usual the unfortunate female slave got the full measure of inhuman cruelty. Certain rights were discretionary, it is true, but many Heb slaves enjoyed valuable individual and social privileges. As far as Scripture statements throw light on this subject, the slaves of OT times might claim the following rights, viz.:

(1) Freedom.—Freedom might be gained in any one of the above-mentioned ways or at the master's will. The non-Hebrew could be held as a slave in perpetuity (Lev 25 44–46).

(2) Good treatment.—"Thou shalt not rule over him [Heb slave] with rigor, but shalt fear thy God. . . . . Ye shall not rule, one over another, with rigor" (Lev 25 43.46). The non-Hebrew seemed to be left unprotected.

(3) Justice.—An ancient writer raises the query of fairness to slaves. "If I have despised the cause of my man-servant or of my maid-servant, when they contended with me; what then shall I do when God riseth up?" (Job 31 13 f). No doubt the true Heb master was considerate of the rights of his slaves. The very fact, however, that the Heb master could punish a Heb slave, "to within an inch of his life," gave ready opportunity for sham justice. "And if a man smite his servant, or his maid ["bondman or bondwoman"], with a rod, and he die under his hand; he shall surely be punished. Notwithstanding, if he continue a day or two, he shall not be punished; for he is his money" (Ex 21 20 f).

(4) Family.—The slave before his release might have his wife and children (Ex 21 5).

(5) Voluntary slavery.—Even when the seventh year came, the slave had a right to pledge himself, with awl-pierced ear, to perpetual service for his master (Ex 21 5 f; Dt 15 16). The traditional interpretation of "for ever" in these passages is "until the next Jubilee year" (cf Ḳiddūshīn 21).

(6) Money or property.—Some cases at least indicate that slaves could have money of their own. Thus, if a poor slave "waxed rich" he could redeem himself (Lev 25 49). Cf 1 S 9 5–10, where, however, the Heb throughout calls the "servant" naʽar, "a youth," never ʽebhedh.

(7) Children.—If married when free, the slave could take wife and children with him when freedom came, but if he was married after becoming a slave, his wife and children must remain in possession of his master. This law led him often into perpetual slavery (Ex 21 3 f).

(8) Elevation.—A chance to rise was allowable in some instances, e.g. Eliezer, a foreign slave in a Heb household, and Joseph, a Heb slave in a foreign household. Each rose to a place of honor and usefulness (Gen 15 2; 39 4).

(9) Religious worship.—After being circumcised, slaves were allowed to participate in the paschal sacrifice (Ex 12 44) and other religious occasions (Dt 12 12).

(10) Gifts.—Upon obtaining freedom, slaves, at the discretion of masters, were given supplies of cattle, grain and wine (Dt 15 13 f).

5. Rights of Slave Masters

The rights of a slave master may briefly be stated as follows: (1) to hold as chattel possession his non-Heb slaves (Lev 25 45); (2) to leave such slaves as an inheritance for his children (Lev 25 46); (3) to hold as his own property the wife and children of all slaves who were unmarried at the time they became slaves (Ex 21 4); (4) to pursue and recover runaway slaves (1 K 2 39–41); (5) to grant freedom at any time to any slave. This is implied rather than stated. Emancipation other than at the Sabbatical and Jubilee years was evidently the right of masters; (6) to circumcise slaves, both Jew and Gentile, within his own household (Gen 17 13.23.27); (7) to sell, give away, or trade slaves (Gen 29 24. According to Tōrath Kōhănīm a Heb servant could be sold only under certain restrictions. See 1, [1]); (8) to chastise male and female slaves, though not unto death (Ex 21 20); (9) to marry a slave himself, or give his female slaves in marriage to others (1 Ch 2 35); (10) to marry a daughter to a slave (1 Ch 2 34 f); (11) to purchase slaves in foreign markets (Lev 25 44); (12) to keep, though not as a slave, the runaway slave from a foreign master (Dt 23 15.16. See 3, [5]); (13) to enslave or sell a caught thief (Gen 44 8–33; Ex 22 3); (14) to hold, in perpetuity, non-Heb slaves (Lev 25 46); (15) to seek advice of slaves (1 S 25 14 ff; but the reference here is open to doubt. See 4, [6]); (16) to demand service (Gen 14 14; 24).

Throughout OT times the rights of both slaves and masters varied, but in general the above may be called the accepted code. In later times Zedekiah covenanted with the Hebrews never again to enslave their own brothers, but they broke the covenant (Jer 34 8).

6. NT Conception

There were slaves during NT times. The church issued no edict sweeping away this custom of the old Judaism, but the gospel of Christ with its warm, penetrating love-message mitigated the harshness of ancient times and melted cruelty into kindness. The equality, justice and love of Christ's teachings changed the whole attitude of man to man and master to servant. This spirit of brotherhood quickened the conscience of the age, leaped the walls of Judaism, and penetrated the remotest regions. The great apostle proclaimed this truth: "There can be neither Jew nor Greek, there can be neither bond nor free, ... ye all are one man in Christ Jesus" (Gal 3 28). The Christian slaves and masters are both exhorted in Paul's letters to live godly lives and make Christlike their relations one to the other—obedience to masters and forbearance with slaves. "Bondservants [m], be obedient unto . . . . your masters, ... as bondservants [m] of Christ . . . . And, ye masters, ... forbear threatening: . . . . their Master and yours is in heaven, and there is no respect of persons with him" (Eph 6 5–9).

Christ was a reformer, but not an anarchist. His gospel was dynamic but not dynamitic. It was leaven, electric with power, but permeated with love. Christ's life and teaching were against Judaistic slavery, Rom slavery and any form of human slavery. The love of His gospel and the light of His life were destined, in time, to make human emancipation earth-wide and human brotherhood as universal as His own benign presence.

SLAYING, slā′ing (by spear, dart, or sword). See Punishments.

SLEEP, slēp: Represents many words in Heb and Gr. For the noun the most common are שֵׁנָה, shēnāh, and ὕπνος, húpnos; for the vb., יָשֵׁן, yāshēn, שָׁכַב, shākhabh, and καθεύδω, katheúdō. The figurative uses for death (Dt 31 16, etc) and sluggishness (Eph 5 14, etc) are very obvious. See Dreams.

SLEEP, DEEP (תַּרְדֵּמָה, tardēmāh, vb. רָדַם, rādham, from a root meaning "to be deaf"): The vb. rādham has no further meaning than "to be fast asleep" (Jgs 4 21; Jon 1 5), but AV used "deep sleep" as a tr only in Dnl 8 18; 10 9, where a sleep supernaturally caused (a "trance") is meant (cf "dead sleep" in Ps 76 6). RV's insertion of "deep sleep" in place of AV's "fast asleep" in Jgs 4 21 is consequently unfortunate. The noun tardēmāh has the same meaning of "trance" in Gen 2 21; 15 12; 1 S 26 12; Job 4 13; 33 15, but in Prov 19 15; Isa 29 10, it is used figuratively of torpor. In Acts 20 9 (húpnos bathús), heavy natural sleep is meant.

Burton Scott Easton

SLEEVES, slēvz (Gen 37 3 m). See Dress.

SLEIGHT, slīt: No connection with "slight," but from the same root as "sly" and so = "cunning." So in Eph 4 14, "sleight of men," for κυβεία, kubeía, "dice-playing" (cf "cube"), "gamblers' tricks," "trickery."

SLIME, slīm, SLIME PITS, slīm′pits (חֵמָר, ḥēmār; LXX ἄσφαλτος, ásphaltos; Vulg bitumen; RVm "bitumen"; cf Arab. حُمَّر, ḥummar, "bitumen"; and cf חֹמֶר, ḥōmer, "clay," "mortar"): In the account of the ark in Gen 6 14, כֹּפֶר, kōpher (LXX ἄσφαλτος, ásphaltos; Vulg bitumen; cf Arab. كُفْر, kufr, "pitch") does not necessarily denote vegetable pitch, but may well mean bitumen. The same may be said of זֶפֶת, zepheth, "pitch" (cf Arab. زِفْت, zift, "pitch"), in Ex 2 3 and Isa 34 9. The word "slime" occurs in the following passages: "And they had brick for stone, and slime had they for mortar" (Gen 11 3); "Now the vale of Siddim was full of slime pits" (Gen 14 10, m "bitumen pits"); "She took for him an ark of bulrushes, and daubed it with slime and with pitch" (Ex 2 3).

Bitumen is a hydrocarbon allied to petroleum and natural gas. It is a lustrous black solid, breaking with a conchoidal fracture, burning with a yellow flame, and melting when ignited. It is probably derived from natural gas and petroleum by a process of oxidation and evaporation, and its occurrence may be taken as a sign that other hydrocarbons are or have been present in the strata. It is found in small lumps and larger masses in the cretaceous limestone on the west side of the Dead Sea, and there is reason to believe that considerable quantities of it rise to the surface of the Dead Sea during earthquakes. In ancient times it was exported to Egypt to be used in embalming mummies. Important mines of it exist at Ḥâsbeiya near Mt. Hermon and in North Syria. Springs of liquid bituminous matter exist in Mesopotamia, where according to Herodotus and other classical writers it was used as mortar with sun-dried bricks. Various conjectures have been made as to the part played by bitumen in the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah. Diodorus Siculus calls the Dead Sea λίμνη ἀσφαλτῖτις, límnē asphaltîtis, "lake of asphalt." See Siddim; Cities of the Plain.

SLING. See Armor, III, 2.

SLIP: As meaning "a cutting from a plant," it is still good Eng. In this sense in Isa 17 10 for זְמוֹרָה, z^{e}mōrāh, "branch," "twig." For the phrase "slip of the tongue" cf Sir 14 1; 19 16; 20 18; 21 7; 25 8.

SLOPES, slōps. See Ashdoth-pisgah.

SLOW, slō: Chiefly for אֶרֶךְ, 'erekh, lit. "long," in the phrase "slow to anger" (Neh 9 17, etc). In Ex 4 10; Lk 24 25; Jas 1 19, for כָּבֵד, kābhēdh; βραδύς, bradús, both meaning "heavy," "sluggish," while Sir 7 35 uses "be slow" for ὀκνέω, oknéō, "hesitate." In addition, AV uses "slow" for ἀργός, árgos, "inactive," in Wisd 15 15, "slow to go" (RV "helpless for walking"), and in Tit 1 12, "slow bellies" (RV "idle gluttons"). In Sir 51 24, AV has "be slow" for ὑστερέω, hustereō, "be lacking" (so RV).

SLUGGARD, slug'ard: Found only in the OT, and there only in Prov. It is the rendering given the word 'āçēl everywhere in RV, but in AV only in Prov 6 6.9; 10 26; 13 4; 20 4; 26 16 (elsewhere AV translates by "slothful"). The root meaning of 'āçēl is "to be sluggish," "stupid." The Eng. word "slug" is said to be "allied to slack" (Webster).

SLUICE, slōōs (שֶׂכֶר, sekher, lit. "hire"): In Isa 19 10, AV reads, "all that make sluices and ponds for fish." RV entirely alters the tr of the whole verse. It reads, "And the pillars of Egypt shall be broken in pieces; all they that work for hire [m "that make dams"] shall be grieved in soul."

SMELL, smel (Heb and Aram. רֵיחַ, rē^{a}ḥ, as noun, "savor," "scent"; רוּחַ, rū^{a}ḥ, as vb., lit. "to breathe," "to inhale," thence "to smell"; ὀσμή, osmḗ, the "smell," "savor," εὐωδία, euōdía, "sweet smell," "fragrance," ὄσφρησις, ósphrēsis, "the sense of smell"; vb. ὀσφραίνομαι, osphraínomai): "And he came near, and kissed him: and he smelled [way-yāraḥ] the smell [rē^{a}ḥ] of his raiment, and blessed him, and said, See, the smell [rē^{a}ḥ] of my son is as the smell [rē^{a}ḥ] of a field which Jeh hath blessed" (Gen 27 27). Idols are described as "gods, the work of men's hands, wood and stone, which neither see, nor hear, nor eat, nor smell" (Dt 4 28). Acceptable sacrifices and pious conduct are called a "sweet smell" or "savor" (Ex 29 18; Eph 5 2; Phil 4 18), well-pleasing to God. The godless life, which dishonors God, is hateful to Him: "I will not smell the savor of your sweet odors" (Lev 26 31). The phrase, "being in bad odor with a person," can be traced to Bib. language: "Ye have made our savor to be abhorred in the eyes of Pharaoh, and in the eyes of his servants" (Ex 5 21). Thus "smell" is occasionally equivalent with "quality," "character": "His [Moab's] taste remaineth in him, and his scent is not changed" (Jer 48 11). Character or quality is the most infallible test, the most manifest advertisement of a thing or a person; thus we find the following very instructive passage: "[God] maketh manifest through us the savor [osmē] of his knowledge in every place. For we are a sweet savor [euōdia] of Christ unto God, in [better: "among"] them that are saved, and in [better: "among"] them that perish; to the one a savor [osmē] from death unto death; to the other a savor [osmē] from life unto life" (2 Cor 2 14–16). See Triumph. In the passage Isa 3 24, AV "sweet smell" (בֶּשֶׂם, besem, "balsam plant") has been changed to "sweet spices" in RV.

SMOKE, smōk: Used figuratively of the Divine jealousy (Dt 29 20) and anger (Ps 74 1); symbolic of the glory of the Divine holiness (Isa 4 5; 6 4; Rev 15 8).

1. Ancient

SMYRNA, smûr'na (Σμύρνα, Smúrna): Smyrna, a large ancient city on the western coast of Asia Minor, at the head of a gulf which reaches 30 miles inland, was originally peopled by the Asiatics known as the Lelages. The city seems to have been taken from the Lelages by the Aeolian Greeks about 1100 BC; there still remain traces of the cyclopean masonry of that early time. In 688 BC it passed into the possession of the Ionian Greeks and was made one of the cities of the Ionian confederacy, but in 627 BC it was taken by the Lydians. During the years 301 to 281 BC, Lysimachus entirely rebuilt it on a new site to the S.W. of the earlier cities, and surrounded it by a wall. Standing, as it did, upon a good harbor, at the head of one of the chief highways to the interior, it early became a great trading-center and the chief port for the export trade. In Rom times, Smyrna was considered the most brilliant city of Asia Minor, successfully rivaling Pergamos and Ephesus. Its streets were wide and paved. Its system of coinage was old, and now about the city coins of every period are found. It was celebrated for its schools of science and medicine, and for its handsome buildings. Among them was the Homerium, for Smyrna was one of several places which claimed to be the birthplace of the poet. On the slope of Mt. Pagus was a theater which seated 20,000 spectators. In the year 23 AD a temple was built in honor of Tiberius and his mother Julia, and the Golden Street, connecting the temples of Zeus and Cybele, is said to have been the best in any ancient city. Smyrna early became a Christian city, for there was one of the Seven Churches of the Book of Rev (2 8–11). There Polycarp, the bishop of Smyrna, was martyred, though without the sanction of the Rom government. It seems that the Jews of Smyrna were more antagonistic than were the Romans to the spread of Christianity, for it is said that even on Saturday, their sacred day, they brought wood for the fire in which Polycarp was burned. His grave is still shown in a cemetery there. Like many other cities of Asia Minor, Smyrna suffered frequently, esp. during the years 178–80 AD, from earthquakes, but it always escaped entire destruction. During the Middle Ages the city was the scene of many struggles, the most fierce of which was directed by Timur against the Christians. Tradition relates that there he built a tower, using as stones the heads of a thousand captives which he put to death, yet Smyrna was the last of the Christian cities to hold out against the Mohammedans; in 1424 it fell into the hands of the Turks. It was the discovery of America and the resulting discovery of a sea route to India which ruined the Smyrna trade.

2. Modern

Modern Smyrna is still the largest city in Asia Minor, with a population of about 250,000, of whom half are Greek and less than one-fourth are Mohammedans. Its modern name, Ismir, is but a Turkish corruption of the ancient name. Even under the Turkish government the city is progressive, and is the capital of the Aidin vilayet, and therefore the home of a governor. Several railroads follow the courses of the ancient routes into the distant interior. In its harbor ships from all parts of the world may be seen. The ancient harbor of Paul's time has been filled in, and there the modern bazaars stand. The old stadium has been destroyed to make room for modern buildings, and a large part of the ancient city lies buried beneath the modern houses and the 40 mosques of which the city boasts. The better of the modern buildings, belonging to the government and occupied by the foreign consuls, stand along the modern quay. Traces of the ancient walls are still to be found. W. of Mt. Pagus is the Ephesian gate, and the Black-gate, as the Turks call it, is near the railroad station. The castle upon Mt. Pagus, 460 ft. above the sea, dates from Byzantine times. The prosperity of Smyrna is due, not only to the harbor and the port of entry to the interior, but partly to the perfect climate of spring and autumn—the winters are cold and the summers are hot; and also to the fertility of the surrounding country. Figs, grapes, valonia, opium, sponges, cotton and liquorice root are among the chief articles of trade. See also CHURCHES, SEVEN.

SNAIL, snāl ([1] חֹמֶט, ḥōmeṭ, RV "sand-lizard," LXX σαῦρα, saúra, "lizard" [Lev 11 30]; [2] שַׁבְּלוּל, shabbelūl, LXX κηρός, kērós, "wax" [Ps 58 8]): (1) Ḥōmeṭ is 7th in the list of unclean "creeping things" in Lev 11 30, and occurs nowhere else. "Snail" is not warranted by LXX or Vulg. RV has "sand-lizard." It may be the skink or a species of Lacerta. See LIZARD. (2) Shabbelūl is trd "snail" in Ps 58 8: "Let them be as a snail which melteth and passeth away." Mandelkern gives limax, "slug." Gesenius derives shabbelūl from bālal, "to pour"; cf Arab. balla, "to wet," instancing λεῖμαξ, leímax, "snail," or "slug," from λείβω, leíbō, "to pour." While LXX has kēros, "wax," Talm (Mōʽēdh Ḳāṭān 6b*) supports "snail." The ordinary explanation of the passage, which is not very satisfying, is that the snail leaves a trail of mucus (i.e. it melts) as it moves along. This does not in any way cause the snail to waste away, because its glands are continually manufacturing fresh mucus. Two large species of snail, Helix aspersa and Helix pomatia, are collected and eaten, boiled, by the Christians of Syria and Pal, esp. in Lent. The Jews and Moslems declare them to be unclean and do not eat them.

SNARE, snâr (פַּח, paḥ; παγίς, pagís, but βρόχος, bróchos, in 1 Cor 7 35): Over half a dozen Heb words are used to indicate different methods of taking birds and animals, of which the snare (פַּח, paḥ) is mentioned oftener than any other. It was a noose of hair for small birds, of wire for larger birds or smaller animals. The snares were set in a favorable location and grain scattered to attract the attention of feathered creatures. They accepted the bribe of good feeding and walked into the snare, not suspecting danger. For this reason the snare became particularly applicable in describing a tempting bribe offered by men to lead their fellows into trouble, and the list of references is a long one, all of the same nature. See Ex 10 7; 1 S 18 21; 28 9; Ps 11 6; 18 5, "snares of death"; used symbolically of anything that may kill: 91 3; 124 7; 140 5; 141 9; Prov 7 23; 13 14; 18 7; 20 25; 22 25; 29 25; Eccl 9 12. "But this is a people robbed and plundered; they are all of them snared in holes, and they are hid in prison-houses: they are for a prey, and none delivereth; for a spoil, and none saith, Restore" (Isa 42 22). Here it is specified that the snare was in a hole so covered as to conceal it. Jer 18 22 clearly indicates that the digging of a pit to take prey was customary, and also the hiding of the snare for the feet. North American Indians in setting a snare usually figure on catching the bird around the neck. Jer 50 24, "I have laid a snare for thee"; Hos 9 8, "A fowler's snare is in all his ways"; Am 3 5 seems to indicate that the snare was set for the feet; Lk 21 34, "But take heed to yourselves, lest haply . . . . that day come on you suddenly as a snare"; Rom 11 9, "Let their table be made a snare, and a trap"; 1 Cor 7 35, "not that I may cast a snare upon you"; 1 Tim 3 7, "the snare of the devil"; also 6 9, "But they that are minded to be rich fall into a temptation and a snare and many foolish and hurtful lusts, such as drown men in destruction and perdition." See GIN; NET; TRAP.

SNEEZE, snēz (זוֹרֵר, zōrēr, Pōʽēl-form זָרַר, zārar): "The child sneezed seven times, and the child opened his eyes" (2 K 4 35). "Sneezing," better "snorting," is found in the description of Leviathan (the crocodile): "His sneezings [עֲטִישָׁה, ʽăṭīshāh] flash forth light, and his eyes are like the eyelids of the morning" (Job 41 18 [Heb 10]). See NEESING.

SNOW, snō (שֶׁלֶג, shelegh, תְּלַג, telagh [Dnl 7 9]; χιών, chiōn): (1) Snow is not uncommon in the winter in Jerus, but it never reaches any depth and in many winters it is not seen at all. It usually disappears, for the most part, as soon as the sun appears, though it may "hide itself" for a time in the gorge cut by a stream (Job 6 16). On lower levels than Jerus there is never sufficient to cover the ground, though often there are some flakes seen in the air. Even at sea-level there is occasionally a sufficient fall of hail to cover the ground. A very exceptional snowfall is related in 1 Macc 13 22 at Adora (near Hebron). It was heavy enough to prevent the movement of troops. (2) The tops of the mountains of Lebanon are white with snow for most of the year, and snow may be found in large banks in the valleys and the northern slopes at any time in the summer. Mt. Hermon, 9,200 ft. high, has long streaks of snow in the valleys all the summer. (3) The snow of the mountains is the source of the water of the springs which last throughout the drought of summer. In case the snow fails there is sure to be a lack of water in the fountains: "Shall the snow of Lebanon fail . . . . or shall the cold waters that flow down from afar be dried up?" (Jer 18 14). (4) Large quantities of snow are stored in caves in the mountains in winter and are brought down to the cities in summer to be used in place of ice for cooling drinks and refrigerating purposes.

(5) God's power over the elements of Nature is often brought out in the OT: "For he saith to the snow, Fall thou on the earth" (Job 37 6); but man cannot fathom the works of God: "Hast thou entered the treasuries of the snow?" (Job 38 22). "The snowy day" (1 Ch 11 22; 2 S 23 20) and the "fear of snow" (Prov 31 21) are figurative uses describing winter and cold. "Snow in summer" (Prov 26 1) would be most out of place, yet it might be most refreshing to the tired workmen in the time of harvest.

(6) Snow is the symbol of purity and cleanness, giving us some of our most beautiful passages of Scripture: "Wash me and I shall be whiter than snow" (Ps 51 7); "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow" (Isa 1 18). Carrying the figure farther, snow-water might be expected to have a special value for cleansing: "If I wash myself with snow-water" (Job 9 30). The most common use in Scripture is to denote whiteness in color and implying purity as well: "His raiment was white as snow" (Dnl 7 9; Mt 28 3; Mk 9 3; Rev 1 14).

(7) The whiteness of leprosy is compared to snow (Ex 4 6; Nu 12 10; 2 K 5 27).

SNUFFERS, snuf′ẽrz, SNUFFDISHES, snuf′-dish-ez (מְֶלְקָחַיִם, melḳāḥayim, מַחְתּוֹת, maḥtōth): These two utensils are thrice mentioned in connection with the wilderness tabernacle (Ex 25 38; 37 23; Nu 4 9). ARV prefers to read "snuffers and snuffdishes" in place of "tongs and snuffdishes" (cf 2 Ch 4 22), the connection between the two utensils being indicated by the fact that both are said to belong to the seven lamps, and were to be made out of the talent of gold which was specified as the weight of the whole (Ex 25 37–39).

The seven-branched candlestick which stood in the holy place of both tabernacle and temple was surmounted, in each of its arms, by a removable lamp in which olive oil was burnt. From the requirement of keeping these lights brilliantly burning throughout each night of the year, arose the need for snuffers and snuffdishes. By the former, the burnt portions of the wick were removed; in the latter they were deposited previous to removal. The lamps may have required to be trimmed as often as every half-hour. For this purpose a priest would enter the outer chamber "accomplishing the services" (He 9 6).

In the time of Solomon's Temple another word than melḳāḥayim was used to describe this utensil. It is מְזַמְּרוֹת, m^ezamm^erōth, from a vb. meaning "to prune" or "trim," and is found in 1 K 7 50; 2 K 12 13; 25 14; 2 Ch 4 22; Jer 52 18. In 4 of these passages, the Eng. text reads, "the snuffers and the basins"; the 5th is merely a summary of things taken to Babylon (2 K 25 14). In this constant later association of "basins" and "snuffers" it is seen that the basins referred to were used for the reception of the cast-off portions of the wicks of the seven lamps, and took the place of the snuffdishes of an earlier age. See TONGS.

SO, sō (סוֹא, ṣō', although the Heb might be pointed סֶוֶא, ṣewe'; Assyr Sib'u; LXX Σηγώρ, Sēgôr, Σωά, Sōá; Manetho, Σεύεχος, Seúechos; Lat Sevechus; Herod. [ii. 137 ff], Σαβακών, Sabakôn): In all probability the "Sabaeo" of Herodotus, the Shabaka, who founded the Ethiopian dynasty, the XXVth of Egyp kings. His date is given as 715–707 BC (Flinders Petrie, History of Egypt, III, 281 ff), but we may suppose that before his accession to the throne he was entitled to be designated king, as being actually regent. To this So, Hoshea, king of Israel, made an appeal for assistance to enable him to throw off the yoke of the Assyr Shalmaneser IV (2 K 17 3 ff). But Hoshea's submission to So brought him no advantage, for Shalmaneser came up throughout all the land and laid siege to Samaria. Not long after the fall of Samaria, So ventured upon an eastern campaign, and was defeated by Sargon, the successor of Shalmaneser, in the battle of Raphia in 720 BC.

SOAP, sōp (בֹּרִית, bōrīth; AV sope): Bōrīth is a derivative of בֹּר, bōr, "purity," hence something which cleanses or makes pure. Soap in the modern sense, as referring to a salt of a fatty acid, for example, that produced by treating olive oil with caustic soda, was probably unknown in OT times. Even today there are districts in the interior of Syria where soap is never used. Cooking utensils, clothes, even the body are cleansed with ashes. The ashes of the household fires are carefully saved for this purpose. The cleansing material referred to in Jer 2 22 (cf LXX ad loc., where bōrīth is rendered by ποία, poía = "grass") and Mal 3 2 was probably the vegetable lye called in Arab. el ḳali (the origin of Eng. alkali). This material, which is a mixture of crude sodium and potassium carbonates, is sold in the market in the form of greyish lumps. It is produced by burning the desert plants and adding enough water to the ashes to agglomerate them. Before the discovery of Leblanc's process large quantities of ḳali were exported from Syria to Europe.

For washing clothes the women sprinkle the powdered ḳali over the wet garments and then place them on a flat stone and pound them with a wooden paddle. For washing the body, oil is first smeared over the skin and then ḳali rubbed on and the whole slimy mixture rinsed off with water. Ḳali was also used anciently as a flux in refining precious metals (cf Mal 3 2). At the present time many Syrian soap-makers prefer the ḳali to the imported caustic soda for soap-making.

In Sus (ver 17) is a curious reference to "washing balls" (smḗgmata). JAMES A. PATCH

SOBER, sō′bẽr, SOBRIETY, sȯ-brī′ė̂-ti, SOBERNESS, sō′bẽr-nes (Gr adj. sôphrōn, and its related nouns, sōphrosúnē, sōphronismós; vbs. sōphronéō and sōphronízō; advb. sōphrónōs, "of sound mind," "self-possessed," "without excesses of any kind," "moderate and discreet"): In Mk 5 15; Lk 8 35, "sane," said of one out of whom demons had just been cast. In the Pastoral Epp., this virtue is esp. commended to certain classes, because of extravagances characterizing particular periods of life, that had to be guarded against, viz. to aged men, with reference to the querulousness of old age (Tit 2 2); to young men, with reference to their sanguine views of life, and their tendency to disregard consequences (Tit 2 6); enjoined upon young women, with reference to extravagance in dress and speech (Tit 2 5; 1 Tim 2 9); and, in a similar manner, commended to ministers, because of the importance of their judgment and conduct, as teachers and exemplars (1 Tim 3 2). "Words of soberness" (Acts 26 25) are contrasted with the "mania," "madness," that Festus had just declared to be the explanation of Paul's eloquence (ver 24).

In a few passages, the Gr vb. nḗphō and its derivative adj. nēphálios are used in the same sense. The word originally had a physical meaning, as opposed to drunkenness, and is thus used in 1 Thess 5 6.8, as the foundation of the deeper meaning. Used metaphorically also in the Pastoral Epp. and 1 Pet, as sometimes in the classics, for "cool," "unimpassioned." Ellicott, on 1 Tim 3 2.11, distinguishes between the two words by regarding sōphrōn "as pointing to the outward exhibition of the inward virtue" implied in nēphalios. H. E. JACOBS
